

Gabinete Catholico 431-15

UNIS.

40(21-9-3

THE

L U S I A D;

O R,

THE DISCOVERY OF INDIA.

A N

EPIC POEM.

TRANSLATED FROM

The Original Portuguese of Luis de Camoens.

By WILLIAM JULIUS MICKLE.

NEC VERBUM VERBO, CURABIS REDDERE, FIDUS INTERPRES. Hor. Art. Poet.

FX BIELL THECA
COLLECT
CAMPULITEESIS.

OXFORD,

PRINTED BY JACKSON AND LISTER;

And Sold by CADELL, in the Strand; DILLY, in the Poultry; Bew, Pater-noster-Row; FLEXNEY, Holborn; EVANS, near York-Buildings; RICHARDSON and URQUHART, under the Royal-Exchange; and GOODSMAN, near Charing-Cross, London.

M,DCC,LXXVI.

Sont of Buckles

VERNET RREAD PRODUCE IN

and the state of t

- I manually him property and to what and it was a second to the second nounce and its shift of man one of

Carlot Brown or By to

was the state of the same

TO THE

DUKE of BUCCLEUGH.

My LORD,

THE first Idea of offering my Lusian to some distinguished Personage, inspired the earnest wish, that it might be accepted by the illustrious Representative of that Family, under which my Father, for many years, discharged the duties of a Clergyman.

Both the late Duke of Buccleugh, and the Earl of Dalkeith, distinguished Him by particular marks of their favour; and I must have forgotten Him, if I could have wished to offer the first Dedication of my literary Labours to any other than the Duke of Buccleugh.

I am, with the greatest respect,

My LORD,

Your Grace's most devoted

And most obedient humble Servant,

WILLIAM JULIUS MICKLE.

A.

IS Highness the Prince of Anhal
Destau. His Highness the Duke of Arenberg. Le Chev. d'Arcy, Marechal de Camp, &c. à Paris. The Right Rev. the Bishop of St. Asaph. The Rev. the Deau of St. Afaph. John Armstrong, M. D. Physician to the Army. M. l'Anglois, Esq; John Arbuthust, Esq; F. R. S. Mr. Thomas Abercrombie. Joseph d'Aguilar, Esq; Mr. James Alvey, Merchant, of Oporto. Mr. Addington, fen. Winchester Coll. Richard Aubrey, Efq; All Souls Coll. Oxon. James Adams, Efq; Univ. Coll. Oxon. Mr. John Applebee, St. John's Coll. Oxon, Mr. Andrew Allan, London. Mr. George Allan, London. Mrs. Airey, Yorkshire. Mr. Thomas Adams, Oxford. Mr. Ashe, Pemb. Coll. Oxon. Mrs. Andrew. Rev. Mr. Adamthwaite, Queen's Coll. Ox.

His Grace the Duke of Buccleugh. Her Grace the Dutchess of Beausort. The Right Hon. Lady Boscawen. The late Right Hon. Earl Bathurst. The Right Hon. Earl Bathurst, Lord Chancellor of Great Britain. The Right Hon. Lord Viscount Bulkley. Sir George Beaumont, Bart. James Boswell, Esq; of Auchinleck. Dr. Blair, Professor of Rhetoric, Edinburgh. Rev. Mr. Bowles, Canon Resid. Sarum. William Bowles, Eqq; New Coll. Oxon. Hon. Barth. Bouverie, Univ. Coll. Oxon. Rev. Mr. Brereton, New Coll. Oxon. Rev. Dr. Buckler, All Souls Coll. Oxon. William Buckler, Eqq; of Boreham. Stephen Briggs, Eqq; Tottenham. Mr. Giles Barker, Merchant, London. James Balmain, Esq; Mr. William Ballantyne, Merchant, London. Mr. Charles Buckeridge, St. John's Coll. Oxon.

Mr. William Bree, Baliol Coll. Oxon. Mr. Biscoe, C. C. C. Oxon. Le Comte de Belgioiofo, Ambassadeur de l'Empire, à Londres. Le Chev. Brito, à Paris. Le Chev. de Bory. Chef d'Esquadre, Membre de l'Academie Royale des Sciences de Paris. Le Chev. de Borda, de l'Academie Royale de Sciences de Paris. M. le Blanc, à Paris. M. le Dr. Bicchierai, à Florence. Le Dr. le Begue du Prisse, à Paris. The late Rev. Dr. Burton, Head Master of Winchester Coll. Charles Henry Burgh, Efg; Oriel Coll. Oxon. Mr. Burland, C. C. C. Oxon. Mr. Birch, Leyton, Esfex, 2 copies. Mr. Thomas Baverstock, Surgeon, Hants. Mr. Barton, Student of Ch. Ch. Oxon. Poole Bathurst, Esq; Mr. S. S. Bale, Ch. Ch. Oxon. Rev. Mr. Christ. Butson, Dublin. The Hon. William Bouvirie, Univ. Coll. Oxon. Edmund Bunny, Efq; Univ. Coll. Oxon. Rev. Mr. James Brifco, Queen's Coll. Oxon. John Bourke, Esq; Univ. Coll. Oxon. . William Wrightson Batty, Esq; Rev. Mr. H. Bathurst, Canon of Ch. Ch. Oxon. Lovelace Bigg, Efq; Charles Bampfylde, Efq; New Coll. Oxon. Anselm Beaumont, Efq; Hugh Bailey, Efq; Daniel Braithwaite, Efq; Richard Barwell, Esq; at Bengal. Edward Baber, Esq; at Bengal. Mr. Richard Barrol, Hereford. Mr. Thomas Brunten, Birmingham. Rev. Mr. George Butt, Ch. Ch. Oxon: Mr. Bateman, London. Mrs Brooke. Mr. Barnet. Mr. John Bell. Rev. Mr. Beresford, St. Mary Hall. Mr. Thomas Bellamy. Charles Bragge, Efq; New Coll. Oxon. Rev. Mr. Bagthaw, Bromley, Kent.

Rev. Mr. John Buckland, C. C. C. Oxon. Rev. Mr. Thomas Bruce, Jesus Coll. Oxon. Mr. Bargus, Pemb. Coll. Oxon. Mr. Burges, Univ. Coll. Oxon. Dr. Bouchier.
Mr. Charles Bathurst, New Coll. Oxon. Ynyr Burges, Esq;
Rev. W. Brookes, St. John's Coll. Oxon. Mr. Fra. Blick, ditto.

The Right Hon. Lord Clive. The Right Hon. Lord Clive. Le Duc de Chanlues, à Paris. L'Abbé de Chappele, F. R. S. à Paris. Le Marquis de Courtenveaux, Capt. Col. des Cent. Suisses, à Paris. Le Marquis de Cordon, Ambassadeur du Roy du Sardaigne, à Londres. Count John Baptist Carburi, F. R. S. &c. à Paris. M. de Cunha, Ambassadeur de Portugal, à la Haye. Lady Courtney. Miss Courtney. Miss Anne Courtney. The Hon. Mrs. Cholmondeley. The Hon. James Cochrane, Bal. Coll. Ox. Sir Thomas Clarges, Bart. His Excell. General Carnac. Sir David Carnegy, Ch. Ch. Oxon. Dr. De la Cour, Physician, Bath. Abbé Chevalier, F. R. S. Dr. Ciera, Professor of the University of Coinibra. Mr. Thomas Cairns, London. Mr. Cooke, Merton Coll. Oxon. Thomas Caldecott, Middle Temple, Esq; John Cater, Esq; New Coll. Oxon. Charles Causton, Esq; London. Jozé Ant. Cardozo, of Lisbon. Mr. W. Cockayne, Surgeon, London. George Capadoce, Esq; z copies. Mr. John Curle. Rev. Mr. Collins, second Master of Winchester School. Rev. Mr. William Crowe, New Coll. Ox. John Campbell, Esq; Queen's Coll. Oxon. Herbert Croft, Esq; Lincoln's Inn, London. Mr. Campbell, Upton St. Leonard's, Gloucester, 3 copies. Mr. Callendar, Baliol Coll. Oxon. Rev. Mr. Clare, St. John's Coll. Oxon. Mr. C. Cox, Oxford. Mr. Cox, C. C. C. Oxon.

Rev. Mr. John Cleaver, Ch. Ch. Oxon.

Mr. J. P. Cummins, New Coll. Oxon.

George Cholmondeley, Efq; Dr. Samuel Cholwick. Rev. Mr. W. Cadogan, Ch. Ch. Oxon. Rev. Mr. Coryton, All Souls Coll. Oxon. Gilbert Clarke, Esq; New Coll. Oxon. John Coker, Esq; New Coll. Oxon. Parker Coke, Efq; All Souls Coll. Oxon. Francis Charlton, Efq; Edward Carver, Esq; Birmingham. John B. Cholwick, Esq; Richard Clarke, Esq; John Cuthbert, Efq; Cox, Esq; Ch. Ch. Oxon. Rev. Mr. Crawford, Baliol Coll. Oxon. Mr. Cure, St. John's Coll. Oxon. Mr. Theodore Corbett, Fort St. George. Mr. Vincentio Corbett, ditto. Charles Cotes, Esq; All Souls Coll. Oxon. Charles Cave, Esq; St. Mary Hall, Oxon. Mr. J. Croker, Wadh. Coll. Oxon. Mr. Charles Chambers, Oriel Coll. Oxon. Mr. Cox, Baliol Coll. Oxon. Chester Reading Club.

Rev. Dr. Douglas, Canon of Windsor. George Dempster, Esq; T. Drummond, Esq; Ch. Ch. Oxon. Robert Drummond, Esq; ditto. Mr. Dutens. Edward Delaval, Efq; F. R. S. Mr. Dumbleton, Univ. Coll. Oxon. Rev. Mr. Davenport, St. John's Coll. Oxon. Thomas Drake, Efq; Rev. Mr. Defalles, Queen's Coll. Oxon. John Daubeney, Esq; James Daubeney, Efq; New Coll. Oxon. Charles Daubeney, Esq; New Coll. Oxon. Nathaniel Draper, Efg; John Davidson, Esq; Mr. Peter Dickens, Hereford. Mr. Philip Davies, ditto. Rev. Mr. Dunster, Trin. Coll. Oxon. Mr. Dalbein, Ch. Ch. Oxon. Mr. Alexander Dunbar, London. Thomas Dunn, Esq; Mr. William Davenport, Oxford.

E.
The Right Hon. Lord Elibank.
Chev. Escarano, Chargé d'Afaires de SeMajesté Chatholique.
Mons. Erdmansdorst.
W. Benson Earle, Esq; Sarum.
Mr. John Elliot, Westminster.
Mr. Elford, Baliol Coll. Oxon.
Mr. John Eton, New Coll. Oxon.

John

John Ewer, Efq; Univ. Coll. Oxon.

Mr. James Eyre, Trin. Coll. Oxon.

— Egerton, Efq;
Gilbert Elliot, Efq; Ch. Ch. Oxon.

Stephen Elliot, Efq; ditto.

Edw. Efcourt, Efq; St. John's Coll. Oxon.

— Efcourt, Efq; Glouceftershire, 8 copies.

Rev. Mr. Evans, New Coll. Oxon.

James Ellis, Efq; Bengal.

Mr. Deputy Ellis.

Jofeph Eyre, Efq; Univ. Coll. Oxon.

Mr. N. Elliott, Oxford.

The Right Hop. the Earl of Finlater. The Right Hon. Lord Viscount Folkestone. M. le Comte de Figuerola, à Brussels. Dr. Franzini, Professor of the University of Coimbra. M. de Franchi. The Rev. Dr. Fothergill, Provost of Queen's Coll. and Vice-Chancellor of the University of Oxford. Rev. Mr. Fothergill, Queen's Coll. Oxon. The Hon. Hugh Fortescue, Esq; Henry Thomas Cope Freeman, Esq; Mr. Frowd, Merton Coll. Oxon. Rich. Fenton, Esq; Middle Temple, Lond. Moses Franco, Esq; Rev. Mr. W. M. Friend, Ch. Ch. Oxon. Mr. Furneaux, Univ. Coll. Oxon. T. E. Freeman, Esq; Queen's Coll. Oxon. Rev. Francis Fawkes, Kent. Farr, Esq; Kenbury, 2 copies.

James Fisher, Esq; C. C. C. Oxon.

Andrew Foley, Esq; Braze-Nose Coll. Oxon.

Rev. Mr. Fitz Thomas, C. C. C. Oxon. Mr. Joseph Fortnom, Oxford. William Fullarton, of Rosemont, Esq; William Fullarton, of Carstairs, Esq;

G.
His Grace the Duke of Grafton.
The Hon. James Grenville.
Le Marquis Grifelli de Rosignan, Ambass.
du Roy du Sardaigne. à Berlin.
Sir William Gordon, British Ambassador at Brussels.
Benjamin Graham, Esq; London.
Mr. Garforth, Univ. Coll. Oxon.
Rev. Mr. Greensteld, Bal. Coll. Oxon.
Ambrose Goddard, Esq; Wilts.
Rev. Dr. Gower, Worcester Coll. Oxon.
Mrs. Gruber, Oxford.
J Gouch, Esq;
George Gray, Esq;
Mr. Florence Gwarkin, Hereford.

David Garrick, Esq; 20 copies.
The late Dr. Goldsmith.
Mr. James Grierson, London.
Mr. David Goodsman, London.
Mr. Green, Oxford.
——— Graves, Esq;
Mr. Grosvenor, Surgeon, Oxon.

James Harris, Esq; Sarum. James Harris, jun. Esq; His Majesty's Minister at the Court of Berlin, 2 copies. David Hume, Esq; John Home, Esq; Rev. Dr. George Horne, President of Magd. Coll. Oxon. Mr. Hutton, Ch. Ch. Oxon. Mr. William Hilliard. Mr. John Hunter. Mr. James Hadow, Baliol Coll. Oxon. Rev. Richard Heighway, ditto. Mr. Hutchinson, Magd. Coll. Oxon. The late Rev. Mr. Hawkins, ditto. John Howe, Esq; Queen's Coll. Oxon. Rev. T. Huntingford, New Coll. Oxon. Rev. G. T. Huntingford, Trin. Coll. Oxon. Rev. Benjamin Hallifax, D. D. Lincoln Coll. Oxon. Mr. Edmund Hague, London. Rev. Mr. Hutton, Baliol Coll. Oxon. Mr. James Hedges, Oxford. Mr. Arch. Hamilton, London. Rev. R. Holmes, New Coll. Oxon. William Harris, Esq; Lincoln's Inn. Julius Hutchinson, Esq;
The Hon. Jos. Hewet, Univ. Coll. Oxon. Thomas Heathcote, Esq; New Coll. Oxon. Douglas Hill, Esq; Robert Hepburn, of Clarkington, Esq; Mr. George Henderson. Thomas Henchman, Esq; Bengal. Mr. Francis Havard, Hereford. Rev. James Herries, A. M. Mr. Hanson, London. Capt. Hutchinson, of the East India Service. John Hoole, East India House. Mr. Samuel Hoole, ditto. Samuel Hoole, Esq; John Hunter, Surgeon, London. Rev. Mr. Haden, Ch. Ch. Oxon: Mr. Hardcaille. Mr. Hollist, New Coll. Oxon. Mr. Hewet, Braze-Nose Coll. Oxon.

Sir James Johnstone, Bart. Westerhall. A Miss Betty Johnstone.

Colonel Johnstone. John Johnstone, Efq; Governor Johnstone. Capt. Walter Johnstone. Sir Banks Jenkinson, Bart. Samuel Johnson, LL.D. William Jones, Esq; Univ. Coll. Oxon. George Jardin, Esq; Professor of Logic, University of Glasgow. Hawton James, Efq; Mr. Jackson, C. C. C. Oxon. Mr. Iremonger, ditto. Mr. T. Jenner, M. A. Morton Coll. Oxon. Dr. Jacob, Sarum. Mr. J. Ireland, Merchant, Bristol. John Jacob, Esq; Wilts. S. Isted, Esq; Gent. Com. New Coll. Ox. J. Ingram, Esq; Fellow of All Souls Coll. Oxon. Mr. Mathew Irwin, at Langholm. Eyles Irwin, Esq; at Madras. James Irwin, Eiq; at Bengal. Mr. William Ireland, St. John's Coll. Ox. Mr. Henry Jones, Attorney, Hereford. Mr. J. Ireland, Oxford. John Irving, Esq; of the Temple, London. Mr. William Jackson, Oxford. Rev. Dr. Jefferson, Ch. Ch. Oxon. Mr. Josiah Jewett. Richard Ingram, Efq; John Innys, Efq; Bristol.

K.
The Right Hon. Lord Kilwalin.
Le Baron de Klingsted, Conseiller d'Etat, &c. à Petersburg.
Rev. Dr. Kennicott, Canon Ch. Ch. Oxon.
The late Mr. T. King, Bath.
Rev. Mr. Knatchbull, Ch. Ch. Oxon.
Johna Kensworth, Esq;
Mr. King, Fellow of New Coll. Oxon.
John Knott, Esq;
William Kenrick, LL. D.
George Knott, of Rydal, Esq;
William Kettle, Esq; Birmingham.
Kennedy, Esq; Ch. Ch. Oxon.

L.
The Right Hon. Lord Lewisham.
Sir James Lake.
Verney Lovett, Esq; Trin. Coll. Cantab.
Egerton Leigh, Esq; Sidney Coll. Cantab.
Rev. Dr. Long, All Souls Coll. Oxon.

Langton, Esq;
Mr. Lomax, St. John's Coll. Oxon.
Rev. Alex. Litchfield, Wadh. Coll. Oxon.

Le Comte de Lauragais.

M. Lifakewitz, Confeiller d'Ambassades de Russia.

Dr. Letsom, F. R. S.
Richard Lanc, Esq; Univ. Coll. Oxon.

The late Rev. Mr. Loggin, New Coll. Ox.
Rev. Mr. Lear, ditto.

Mr. John Lacock, Hereford.

Anthony Lax, of Chesterfield, Esq; Derbyshire.

Mr. W. Lypscomb, C. C. C. Oxon.

Robert Lechmere, Esq; Gent. Com. Queen's Coll. Oxon.

John Loveday, Esq; Madg. Coll. Oxon.

Mr. James Lister, Oxford.

Mr. John Leech, ditto.

His Excell. the Earl Marischall of Scotland, Berlin. M. le Prince Massalski, à Warsovie. M. l'Abbe Marci, Chancelier de l'Univerfité de Lourain. M. le Comte de Merci, Ambassadeur de l'Empire à Paris. M. Trudaine de Montigny, Conseiller d'Etat, et Intend. General des Finances, à Paris. M. le Comte Moussin-Pouschkin, Ambassad. de l'Emperatrice de Toutes les Russies, à Londres. Madamoifelle Murray, at Bruffels. John-Hyacinth de Magellan, F. R. S. Charles May, Esq; Mr. Kenneth Makenzie, London. Mr. James Makenzie, ditto. Mr. James Morrison, ditto. Francis Martin, Esq; of Antigua. John Maxwell, Esq; of Broomholme. Thomas Mayne, Esq; Mrs. Millar, London. Mr. John Murray, Fleet-Street, London. John Millar, Efg; Professor of Civil Law, Glasgow. - Maxwell, Efq; Univ. Coll. Oxon. Thomas Mathews, Efq; Mr. Philip Mallet, Wine-Merchant, Lond. Mr. Moore, Odiham, Hants. Mr. John Murdoch, London. The late Rev. Mr. Macock, Lin. Coll. Qv. - Marriott, Efq; Queen's Coll. Oxon. Mr. Muster, Gent. Com. New Coll. Oxon. Mr. M'Carty, Univ. Coll. Oxon. Mr. John Monro, St. John's Coll. Oxon. Rev. Dr. Moore, Ch. Ch. Oxon. John Maddison, Esq; C. Massingberd, Esq; New Coll. Oxon. Rev.

Rev. Mr. Miller, New Coll. Oxon.
Richard Meade, Efq; Hert. Coll. Oxon.
Samuel Middleton, Efq; Bengal.
Abraham Martin, Efq;
Paul Col. Methuen, Efq; Univ. Coll. Ox.
Mr. la Mefurier, New Coll. Oxon.
Arch. Macdonald, Efq; Lincoln's Inn.

N.
Mr. l'Abbé Nicoli, Chargé d'Affaires de Tescane, à Paris.
Tuberville Needham, F. R. S. Director of the Imperial Academy at Brussels.
Edward Norton, Esq; Univ. Coll. Oxon.
Francis Newdigate, Esq; ditto.
Mr. Richard Newman, Worcester.
Mr. John Nicols, London.
Basilius Nikitin, Esq; Gent. of Russia, St.
Mary-Hall, Oxon.
The late Rev. Mr. Nunenam.

O.
The Right Rev. the Bishop of Oxford.
Rev. Dr. Oglander, Warden of New Coll.
Oxon.
Rev. Mr. Hen. Oglander, New Coll.Oxon.
Robert Orme, Esq;
Charles O'Hara, Esq;
Rev. Mr. Owen, Queen's Coll. Oxon.

Monf. le Chev. Pinto, Ambassad. du Roy du Portugal, à Londres. Le Prince Pignatelli, à Paris. The Right Rev. the Bishop of Peterborough. Lord Pitfour, Senator of the College of Justice. M. le Marquis du Pezay, Mestre de Camp de Dragons, &c. à Paris. Monf. Patu, Baron de Melo, à Paris. Le Baron de Poederle. William Poultney, Efq; Rev. Sir Henry Parker, Bart.
John Paradife, Efq; F. R. S.
Nathaniel Pigott, Efq; F. R S.
Joseph Priestley, LL. D. F. R. S.
William Pitt, Efq; 2 copies. William Powlett, Efq; New Coll. Oxon. Robert Pasley, Esq; Lisbon. John Pasley, Esq; Teneriffe, 20 copies. Charles Passey, Esq; of ditto. John Perry, Esq; of Oporto Capt. Thomas Pasley, of the Navy. Mr. Abraham de Paz, London. Rev. Mr. Prosser, Bal. Coll. Oxon. - Paul, Esq; Gloucestershire, Mr. J. Payton, Oxford.

Thomas Pearson, Esq;
Edward Poore, Esq; Queen's Coll. Oxon.
2 copies, fine.
Rev. Dr. Thomas Percy.
Mr. Page, Univ. Coll. Oxon.
Rev. Mr. Price, Wadh. Coll. Oxon.
Richard Parrot, Esq; Warwickshire.
Samuel Potts, Esq;
Anthony Polier, Esq; Bengal.
Mr. Edward Philpot, Hereford.
Messrs Pearson and Rollason, Birmingham.
Mr. Andrew Price, Magd. Coll. Oxon.
Mr. Power, near Stroud, Gloucestershire.
Mr. Pechell, Ch. Ch. Oxon.
Mr. Pomeroy, ditto.

His Grace the Duke of Richmond. M. le Baron Reigersfeldt, Secretaire de l'Ambassadeur de l'Empire, à Londres. M. le Roy, de l'Academie Royale des Sciences, à Paris. Rev. Dr. William Robertson, Principal of the University of Edinburgh. Mr. Reeves, Merton Coll. Oxon. William Henry Reynell, Esq; Falmouth. Mr. William Russel, Gray's Inn, London. Rev. T. Robinson, Merton Coll. Oxon. Henry Ridley, Efq; Univ, Coll. Oxon. William Rose, Esq; Ex. Coll. Oxon. Rev. Mr. Henry Richards, ditto. John Royds, Esq; Univ. Coll. Oxon. Mr. Reay, ditto. Mr. James Robertson, Bal. Coll. Oxon. J. Ross, Esq; - Read, Esq; St. Mary Hall, Oxon. Isaac Reed, Esq; Staple Inn, London. Thomas Rumbold, Efq; Jacob Rider, Esq; Bengal. Mr. Charles Rathband, West Chester. Mr. Hugh Randal, London. Charles Rooke, Esq; Merton Coll. Oxon. Mr. Richardson, Printer, London. John Christopher Roberts, Esq; Rev. Mr. Rogers, Ch. Ch. Oxon. Rev. Mr. Ruffel, C. C. C. Oxon. Rev. Mr. Edward Richardson, Kildare. Rev. Mr. Richards, Wadh. Coll. Oxon.

S.
The Right Hon. the Earl of Shelburne.
The late Sir Charles Shuckburg.
Sir George Shuckburg.
Ifaac Henriques de Sequeira, M. D. Lond.
Manuel Fra. Silva, Efq;
Mr. Prochore Suvoroff, Gent. of Russia,
Queen's Coll. Oxon.

John

John Smith, M. D. Savilian Professor, Ox. M. Dionis du Sejour, Conseiller au Parl. à Paris. M. le Comte de Spangen, à Bruffels. M. Souza, Ambast. du Portugal, à Paris. Dr. Spielmann, Professor at Strasbourg. Le Comte Scarnafis, Ambassadeur du Roy du Sardaigne, à Vienna.

Hugh Stoddard, Efq; Jesus Coll. Oxon.

Dr. Anthony Ribeiro Sanchez, of the Imperial Academy at Petersburg. Mr. le President de Saron, à Paris. Mr. Stewart, Student of Ch. Ch. Oxon. John Stevenson, Esq; Univ. Coll. Oxon. Christopher Steigar, Esq; ditto. William Scott, Efq; ditto. Mr. John Scott, ditto. Rev. Mr. William Stratford, C. C. C. Ox. Henry Strachey, Esq; Cullen Smith, Esq; Giles Stibbart, Efq; Russel Skinner, of Theobalds, Esq: Isaac Sage, Esq; Arch. Swinton, of Manderston, Esq; John Swinton, of Swinton, Esq; William Swinton, Esq; John Stables, Esq; John Shakespear, Esq; Bengal. Joseph Scott, Esq; of Langley. Mr. Joseph Salt, Birmingham. Mr. Swinney, Bookseller, ditto. William Smith, Esq; John Scott, Esq; Mr. Francis Spilsbury. Mr. John Sim, Oxford. Rev. Joseph Smith, Oriel Coll. Oxon. Mr. John Stevens, Apothecary, Oxford.

The Right Hon. the Earl Temple. Hon. and Rev. Dr. Tracey, Warden of All Souls Coll. Oxon. Le Comte de Tressan, Lieutenant General, &c. à Paris. Mr. Tackoen, Conseiller au grand Conseil, à Malines. Ahbé Thisbaert, Doyen du Jacques, Professeur à Lourain. Capt. Primrose Thomson, in India, 2 copies. Marmaduke Tunstal, Esq; F. R. S. Mr. James Trift, St. John's Coll. Oxon. Mr. Tripe, Univ. Coll. Oxon. Mr. Samuel Taner, Baliol Coll. Oxon. Mr. Taterfall, C. C. C. Oxon. Mic. Angelo Taylor, Esq; ditto. Charles Tillard, Efq; Univ. Coll. Oxon. Mr. Talbot, ditto.

Harry Verelst, Esq;
Mr. de la Voisiere, de l'Academie Royale de Sciences de Paris.
Mr. de Villoison, de l'Academie Royale des Inscriptions, à Paris.

Vellez, Esq; St. John's Coll. Oxon. Thomas Violet, Esq; ditto.
Mr. Richard Valpy, Pemb. Coll. Oxon.

The Right Hon. the Earl of Winchelsea. Rev. Mr. T. Warton, Trin. Coll. Oxon. Rev. Dr. J. Warton, Head Master of Winchester School. Rev. Dr. Wheeler, Professor of Poetry, Oxon, 2 copies. Rodolph Waltravers, Efq; F. R. S. Benjamin Wilson, F.R.S. of the Royal Academy at Upfal. Dr. Wolfe. Bouchier Wray, Esq; New Coll. Oxon. Henry Penruddocke Wyndham, Esq; Rev. Dr. Wynne, All Souls Coll. Oxon. Mr. Thomas Wright, Printer, London. Mr. Welch, Univ. Coll. Oxon. Mr. Woodhouse, C. C. C. Oxon. Rev. Mr. Benjamin Webb, Odiham, Hants. Mr. Willis, Wadham Coll. Oxon. Rev. Mr. T. Walker, Tylchurst, Berks. Mr. John Cope Westcott, Ex. Coll. Oxon. John Warde, Esq; Watersham, Kent. Rev. Mr. Wood, Bal. Coll. Oxon. Francis Wastie, Esq; Oxfordshire. William Wyndham, Esq; Univ. Coll. Ox. Edward Watts, Esq; ditto. Benedict Freeman Willis, Esq; ditto. Rev. Mr. Webber, New Coll. Oxon. White, Esq; Student of Ch. Ch. Ox. Rev. Mr. Williams, of Winchester Coll. . Ed. Winnington, Esq; Ch. Ch. Oxon. Thomas Watts, Efq; Hugh Watts, Efq: William Wynne, E.fq; Bengal.

The late Rev. W. Gwin, Principal of Braze-Nose Coll. Oxon.

James Wathan, Esq; of Dinder, Herefordshire.

Mr. William Winston, Hereford.

Mr. Gerard Walker, ditto.

Mr. John Wathan, ditto.

John Wyrley, Esq; near Birmingham.

Thomas Woodhouse, Esq; All Souls Coll.

Oxon.

Rev. Mr. White, Arabic Prosessor, Oxon.

Ralph Winter, Efq;
Mr. Weston, Ex. Coll. Oxon.
Michael Wodhul, Efq; Gloucestershire.
Rev. Mr. James Williamson, Hert. Coll.
Oxon.
John Wilmott, Efq; All Souls Coll. Oxon.
Mr. Winstanley, Braze-Nose Coll. Oxon.

Y. Mr. Young, Univ. Coll. Oxon. Mrs. Yates, 2 copies.

ERRATA.

p. xxxv. 1. 29. for left, read left.

p. 149. in the notes, second column, 1. 4, for where, read and.

p. 156. l. 9. for spear-staff, read spear-staffs.

p. 204. fecond column of notes, for faces, read foes,

p. 224. l. 14. for streams, read steams.

p. 256. l. 8. for closen, read cloven.

And in p. 293. first column of the notes, and first line, in place of ten thousand, read ten millions. Some other errors, mostly of punctuation and orthography, will be obvious to the reader; who will perceive, that the note on p. 279, and p. vii. of the Introduction, were at press ere the peace between the Russians and Turks, and ere the present unhappy commotions in America.

In p. xxxiv. of the Introduction, 1. 16. first column of the notes, after this sentence, All a mistake—the reader is desired to add the following: Nor is the Author of Histoire Philosophique, &c. less unhappy. Misled by the common opinion of Columbus, he has thus pompously cloathed it in the dress of imagination—Un homme obscur, says he, plus avance que son siecle, &c.—thus literally, an obscure man, more advanced than his age in the knowledge of astronomy and navigation, proposed to Spain, happy in her internal dominion, to aggrandise herself abroad. Christopher Columbus selt, as if by instinct, that there must be another continent, and that he was to discover it. The Antipodes, treated by reason itself as a chimera, and by superstition, as error and impiety, were in the eyes of this man of genius an incontestible truth. Full of this idea, one of the grandest which could enter the human mind, he proposed, &c.—The ministers of this Princess (Isabel of Spain) esteemed at first as a visionary, a man who pretended to discover a world—Thus the Abbe R—But be it our's to restore his due honours to the Prince of Portugal. Henry, &c.

In p. clvii. of the Introduction, l. 11. after, a Hector and a Priam, the reader is also desired to add: If Camoens has happily avoided the exhausted contrast of sierce and mild heroes, he has nevertheless been able to give his poem more manners than the Eneid. And if his subject obliged him to have less action than the Iliad, it has allowed him to display more empressent and fire, more of the real action of the conduct, divested of the episodes, than the Odyssey, though the Odyssey be esteemed the most persest model of Epic composition.

INTRODUCTION

TO THE

L U S I A D.

F a concatenation of events centered in one great action, events which gave birth to the present Commercial System of the World, if these be of the first importance in the civil history of mankind, the Lusiad, of all other poems, challenges the attention of the Philosopher, the Politician, and the Gentleman.

In contradiftinction to the Iliad and Æneid, the Paradife Lost has been called the Epic Poem of Religion. In the same manner may the Lusiad be named the Epic Poem of Commerce. The happy completion of the most important designs of Henry Duke of Viseo, Prince of Portugal, to whom Europe owes both Gama and Columbus, both the Eastern and the Western Worlds, constitutes the subject of that celebrated Epic Poem, (known hitherto in England almost only by name) which is now offered to the English Reader. But before we proceed to the historical introduction necessary to elucidate a poem founded on such an important period of history, some attention is due to the opinion of those Theorists in political philosophy who lament that either India was ever discovered, and who assert that the increase of Trade is only the parent of degeneracy, and the nurse of every vice.

Much indeed may be urged on this side of the question, but much also may be urged against every institution relative to man. Imperfection, if not necessary to humanity, is at least the certain attendant on every thing human. Though some part of the trassic with many countries resemble Solomon's importation of apes and peacocks; though the superfluities of life, the baubles of the opulent, and even the luxuries which

b

enervate the irresolute and administer disease, are introduced by commerce; the extent of the benefits which attend it are also to be considered, ere the man of cool reason will venture to pronounce that mankind are injured, are rendered less virtuous and less happy by the increase of Commerce.

If a view of the state of mankind, where Commerce opens no intercourse between nation and nation be neglected, unjust conclusions will certainly follow. Where the state of barbarians and of countries under the different degrees of civilization are candidly weighed, we may reasonably expect a just decision. As evidently as the appointment of Nature gives pasture to the herds, as evidently is man born for society. As every other animal is in its natural state when in the situation which its instinct requires; so man, when his reason is cultivated, is then, and only then, in the state proper to his nature. The life of the naked favage, who feeds on acorns and fleeps like a beaft in his den, is commonly called the natural state of man; but if there be any propriety in this affertion, his rational faculties compose no part of his nature, and were given not to be used. If the savage therefore live in a state contrary to the appointment of nature, it must follow that he is not so happy as nature intended him to be. And a view of his true character will confirm this conclusion. The reveries, the fairy dreams of a Rouffeau, may figure the paradifial life of a Hottentot, but it is only in such dreams that the happiness of the barbarian exists. The savage, it is true, is reluctant to leave his manner of life; but unless we allow that he is a proper judge of the modes of living, his attachment to his own by no means proves that he is happier than he might otherwise have been. His attachment only exemplifies the amazing power of habit in reconciling the human breast to the most uncomfortable situations. If the intercourse of mankind in some instances be introductive of vice, the want of it as certainly excludes the exertion of the noblest virtues; and if the seeds of virtue are indeed in the heart, they often lie dormant, and unknown even to the favage possessor. The most beautiful description of a tribe of savages, which we may be assured is from real life, occurs in these words; And the five spies of Dan "came to Laish, and saw the people that were there, how they dwelt careless after the manner of the Zidonians, quiet and secure, and there was no magistrate in the land that that might put them to shame in any thing . . . And the spies said to their brethren, Arise, that we may go up against them; for we have feen the land, and behold it is very good . . . and they came unto Laish, unto a people that were quiet and secure, and they smote them with the edge of the sword, and burnt the city with fire; and there was no Deliverer, because it was far from Zidon, and they had no bufiness with any man-However the happy simplicity of this society may please the man of fine imagination, the true philosopher will view the men of Laish with other eyes. However virtuous he may suppose one generation. the children of the next were fure to fink into every vice of brutality. When his wants are eafily supplied, the manners of the favage will be simple, and often humane, for the human heart is not vicious without objects of temptation. But these will foon occur; he that gathers the greatest quantity of fruit will be envied by the less industrious: The human passions will operate, and where there is no magistrate to put to shame in any thing, depredation will soon display all its horrors. And could fuch a tribe be secured from the consequences of their own unrestrained passions, could even this impossibility be furmounted, still are they a wretched prey to the first invaders, and because they have no business with any man, they will find no deliverer. While human nature is the fame, the fate of Laish will always be the fate of the weak and defenceless; and thus the most amiable description of savage life, raises in our minds the strongest imagery of the misery and impossible continuance of such a state. But if the view of Laish then terminate in horror, with what contemplation shall we behold the wilds of Africa and America? Immense tracts peopled by a few tribes scattered at great distances, who esteem and treat each other as beasts of the chace. Attachment to their own tribe constitutes their highest idea of virtue; but this virtue includes the most brutal depravity, makes them confider the man of every other tribe as one with whom nature had placed them in a state of war, and had commanded to destroy*.

crease, the stronger commit depredations on the weaker; and thus from generation to generation, they who either dread just punishment or unjust oppression, sly farther and farther in search of that protection which is only to be found in civilized society.

This ferocity of favage manners affords a philosophical account how the most distant and inhospitable climes were first peopled. When a Romulus erects a monarchy and makes war on his neighbours, some naturally sty to the wilds. As their families in-

And to this principle their customs and ideas of honour serve as rituals and ministers. The ancient cruelties practifed by the American savages on their prisoners of war (and war was their chief employment) convey every idea expressed by the word diabolical, and give a most shocking view of the degradation of human nature. But what peculiarly completes the character of the favage, is his horrible superstition. In the most distant nations the savage is in this the same. The terror of evil spirits continually haunts him, and his God is beheld as a relentless tyrant, and is worshipped often with cruel rites. always with a heart full of horror and fear. In all the numerous accounts of favage worship, one trace of filial dependance is not to be found. The very reverse of that happy idea is the hell of the ignorant mind. Nor is this barbarism confined alone to those ignorant tribes, whom we call savages. The vulgar of every country possess it in certain degrees, proportionated to their opportunities of conversation with the more enlightened. Selfishness, cruel and often cowardly ferocity, together with the most unhappy superstition, are every where the proportionate attendants of ignorance and severe want. And ignorance and want are only removed by intercourse and the offices of society. So felf-evident are these positions, that it requires an apology for infifting upon them; but the apology is at hand. He who has read knows how many eminent writers*, and he who has conversed knows how many respectable

* The author of that voluminous work, Histoire Philosophique & Politique des Etablissemens & du Commerce des Européens dans les deux Indes, is one of the many who affert that the favage is happier than the civil life. His reasons are thus abridged: The favage has no care or fear for the future, his hunting and fishing give him a certain fubfistence. He sleeps found, and knows not the difeases of cities. He cannot want what he does not defire, nor defire that which he does not know, and vexation or grief do not enter his foul. He is not under the controul of a superior in his actions; in a word, fays our author, the favage only suffers the evils of nature.

If the civilized, he adds, enjoy the elegancies of life, have better food, and are more comfortably defended against the change of feasons, it is use which makes these things necessary, and they are purchased by the painful labours of the multitude who are the basis of society. To what outrages is not the man of civil life exposed? if he has property it is in danger; and government or authority is, according to our author, the greatest of all evils. If there is a samine in the north of America, the favage, led by the wind and the sun, can go to a better clime; but in the horrors of samine, war, or pessilence, the ports and barriers of polished states place the subjects in a prison, where they must perish—In reservice encore—There still remains an infinite difference between the lot of the civilized and the savage; a difference, toute entiere, all entirely to the disadvantage of society, that injustice which reigns in the inequality of fortunes and conditions. "In sine, says he, as the wish for independence names, connect the idea of innocence and happiness with the life of the savage and the unimproved rustic. To fix the character of the savage was therefore necessary, ere we examine the affertion, that it had been happy for both the old and the new worlds if the East and West Indies had never been discovered. The bloodshed and the attendant miseries which the unparral-

is one of the first instincts of man, he who can join to the possession of this primitive right, the moral security of a subsistence, (which we were just told the savage could do) is incomparably more happy than the rich man surrounded with laws, superiors, prejudices and sassions, which endanger his liberty."———

Such are the fentiments of a writer, whose historical intelligence has acquired him a reputation on the continent; and as he is not fingular in his estimate of savage happiness, his absurdities merit some observation. And nothing can be more evident, than that if habit destroy the relish of the elegancies of life, habit also will destroy the pleasure of hunting and fishing, when these are the sole business of the savage. You may as well fay, a postillion jaded with fatigue and shivering with wet and cold, is extremely happy because gentlemen ride on horseback for their pleasure. That we cannot want what we do not desire, nor desire what we do not know, are just positions; but does it follow, that such state is happier than that which brings the wishes and cares of civil life? By no means: For, according to this argument, infensibility and happiness proceed in the same gradation, and of consequence an oyster is the happiest of all animals. The advantages ascribed to the savage over the civilized in the time of war and samine, in the equality of rank, and fecurity of liberty, outrage common fense, and are striking instances that no abfurdities are too gross for the reveries of modern philosophy. This author quite forgets what dangers the favages are every where exposed to, how their lands, if of any value, are fure to be feized by their more powerful neighbours, and millions of their persons enslaved by the more polithed states. He quite forgets the infinite distance between the resources of the social and savage life; between the comforts administered by fociety to infirmity and old age, and the miferable state of the favage when he can no longer pursue his hunting and fish-ing. He also quite forgets the infinite dif-ference between the discourse of the savage hut, and the cana decrum, the friendship and conversation of refined and elevated understandings. But to philosophise is the contagion which infects the esprits forts of the continent; and under the mania of this disease, there is no wonder that common sense is so often crucified. It is only the reputation of those who support some opinions that will vindicate the use of refuting them. We may therefore, it is hoped, be forgiven, if, en bagatelle, we smile at the triumph of our author, who thus sums. up his arguments: " Après tout, un met peut terminer ce grand procès—After all, one word will decide this grand dispute,

if fortement débatue entre les philosophes,
fo strongly canvassed among philosophers:
Demand of the man of civil life, if he " is happy? Demand of the favage, if he is miferable? If both answer, No, the " dispute is determined." By no means.; for the beast that is contented to wallow in the mire, is by this argument in a happier state than the man who has one wish to fatisfy, however reasonably he may hope to do it by his industry and virtue.

[•] And our author in reality goes as far, " Temoin cet Ecossois,— Witness that Scotchman, says he, who being left alone on the isle of Fernandez, was only unhappy while his memory remained; but when his natural wants so engrossed him that he forgot his country, his language, his name, and even the articulation of words, this European, at the end of four years, sound himself eased of the burden of social life, in having the happiness to lose the use of resection, of these thoughts which led him back to the past, or taught him to dread the suture." But this is as erroneus in sast, as such happiness is salse in philosophy. Alexander Schirk sell into no such state of happy identifin; and on his return to England, the remembrance of his sufferings on the isle of Fernandez, afforded the hint of Robinson Crusoe.

lelled rapine and cruelties of the Spaniards spread over the new world, indeed difgrace human nature. The great and flourishing empires of Mexico and Peru, steeped in the blood of forty millions of their fons, present a melancholy prospect, which must excite the indignation of every good heart. Yet fuch desolation is not the certain consequence of discovery. And even should we allow that the depravity of human nature is so great, that the avarice of the merchant and rapacity of the foldier will overwhelm with mifery every new discovered country, still are there other, more comprehensive views, to be taken, ere we decide against the intercourse introduced by navigation. When we weigh the happiness of Europe in the scale of political philosophy, we are not to confine our eye to the dreadful ravages of Attila the Hun, or of Alaric the Goth. If the waters of a stagnated lake are disturbed by the spade when led into new channels, we ought not to inveigh against the alteration because the waters are fouled at the first; we are to wait to fee the streamlets refine and spread beauty and utility through a thousand vales which they never visited before. Such were the conquests of Alexander, temporary evils, but civilization and happiness followed in the bloody tract. And though difgraced with every barbarity, happiness has also followed the conquests of the Spaniards in the other hemisphere. Though the villainy of the Jesuits deseated their schemes of civilization in many countries, the labours of that society have been crowned with a fuccess in Paraguay and in Canada, which does them the greatest honour. The customs and cruelties of many American tribes still disgrace human nature, but in Paraguay and Canada the natives have been brought to relish the bleffings of society and the arts of virtuous and civil life. If Mexico is not so populous as it once was, neither is it so barbarous*; the

The innocent fimplicity of the Americans in their conferences with the Spaniards, and the horrid cruelties they suffered, divert our view from their complete character. But almost every thing was horrid in their civil customs and religious rites. In some tribes, to cohabit with their mothers, sisters, and daughters, was esteemed the means of domestic peace. In others, catamites were maintained in every village; they went from house to house as they pleased, and it was unlawful to resuse them what victuals they chused. In every tribe, the captives taken in war were murdered with the most wanton cruelty, and afterwards devoured by the victors. Their religious rites were, if possible, still more horrid. The abominations of ancient Moloch were here outnumbered; children, virgins, slaves, and captives, bled on different altars, to appease their various gods. If there was a scarcity of human victims, the priests announced that the gods were dying of thirst for human blood. And to prevent a threatened famine fhrieks of the human victim do not now resound from temple to temple, nor does the human heart, held up reeking to the Sun, imprecate the vengeance of heaven on the guilty empire. And however impolitically despotic the Spanish governments may be, still do these colonies enjoy the opportunities of improvement, which in every age arise from the knowledge of commerce and of letters, opportunities which were never enjoyed in South America under the reigns of Montezuma and Atabalipa. if from Spanish we turn our eyes to British America, what a glorious prospect! Here once on the wild lawn, perhaps twice in the year, a few savage hunters kindled their evening fire, kindled it more to protect them from evil spirits and beasts of prey, than from the cold, and with their feet pointed to it, slept on the ground. Here now population spreads her thousands, and society appears in all its bleffings of mutual help, and the mutual lights of intellectual improvement. "What work of art, or power, or " public utility, has ever equalled the glory of having peopled-" a continent, without guilt or bloodshed, with a multitude of " free and happy common-wealths, to have given them the " best arts of life and government!" This, indeed, is the greatest glory of the British crown, " a greater than any other by fupplying the altars, the kings of Mexico were obliged to make war on the neighbouring states. The prisoners of either side died by the hand of the priest. But the number of the Mexican facrifices fo greatly exceeded those of other nations, that the Tlascalans, who were hunted down for this purpose, readily joined Cortez with about 200,000 men, and fired by the most fixed hatred, enabled him to make one great facrifice of the Mexican nation. Who that views Mexico, steeped in her own blood, can restrain the emotion which whispers to him, This is the hand of heaven !—By the number of these facred butcheries, one would think that cruelty was the greatest amusement of Mexico. At the dedication of the temple of Vitzuliputzli, A.D. 1486, 64,080 human victims were facrificed in four days. And, according to the best accounts, the annual sacrifices of Mexico required several thousands. The skulls of the victims sometimes were hung on strings which reached from tree to tree around their temples, and fometimes were built up in towers and cemented with lime. In some of these towers Andrew de Tapia one day counted 136,000 skulls. During the war with Cortez they increased their usual facrifices, till priest and people were tired of their bloody religion. Frequent embassies from different tribes complained to Cortez that they were weary of their rites, and intreated him to teach them his law. And though the Peruvians, it is faid, were more polished, and did not sacrifice quite so many as the Mexicans, yet 200 children was the usual hecatomb for the health of the Ynca, and a much larger one of all ranks honoured his obsequies. The method of facrifysing was thus; Six priests laid the victim on an altar, which was narrow at top, when five bending him across, the fixth cut up his flomach with a sharp slint, and while he held up the heart reeking to the sun, the others tumbled the carcale down a slight of stairs near the altar, and immediately proceeded to the next facrifice. See Acosta, Gomara, Careri, the Letters of Cortez to Charles V. &c. &c.

" nation ever acquired;" and from the consequences of the genius of Henry, Duke of Viseo, did the British American empire arise, an empire which most probably will one day be the glory of the world.

Stubborn indeed must be the Theorist, who will deny the improvement, virtue and happiness, which in the result, the voyage of Columbus has spread over the Western World. The happiness which Europe and Asia have received from the intercourse with each other, cannot hitherto, it must be owned, be compared either with the possession of it, or the source of its increase established in America. Yet let the man of the most melancholy views estimate all the wars and depredations which are charged upon the Portuguese and other European nations, still will the Eastern World appear considerably advantaged by the voyage of Gama. If feas of blood have been shed by the Portuguese, nothing new was introduced into India. War and depredation were no unheard of strangers on the banks of the Ganges, nor could the nature of the civil establishments of the eastern nations secure a lasting peace. The ambition of their native princes was only diverted into new channels, into channels, which in the natural course of human affairs, will certainly lead to permanent governments, established on improved laws and just dominion. Yet even ere such governments are formed, is Asia no loser by the arrival of Europeans. horrid massacres and unbounded rapine which, according to their own annals, followed the victories of their Asian conquerors, were never equalled by the worst of their European vanguishers. Nor is the establishment of improved governments in the East the dream of theory. The superiority of the civil and military arts of the British, notwithstanding the hateful character of some individuals, is at this day beheld in India with all the assonishment of admiration, and all the desire of imitation. This, however retarded by various causes, must in time have a most important effect, must fulfil the prophecy of Camoens, and transfer to the British the high compliment he pays to his countrymen;

Beneath their sway majestic, wise and mild, Proud of her victor's laws thrice happier India smiled.

In former ages, and within these few years, the fertile empire of India has exhibited every scene of human misery, under the undistinguishing ravages of their Mohammedan and native princes; ravages only equalled in European history by those committed under Attila, furnamed the scourge of God, and the destroyer of nations. The ideas of patriotism and of honour were feldom known in the cabinets of the eastern princes till the arrival of the Europeans. Every species of affassination was the policy of their courts, and every act of unrestrained rapine and masfacre followed the path of victory. But some of the Portuguese governors, and many of the English officers, have taught them, that humanity to the conquered is the best, the truest policy. The brutal ferocity of their own conquerors is now the object of their greatest dread; and the superiority of the British in war has convinced their * princes, that an alliance with the British is the surest guarantee of their national peace and prosperity. While the English East India Company are possesfed of their present greatness, it is in their power to diffuse over the East every bleffing which flows from the wifest and most humane policy, a policy till of late unknown, even in idea, in Asia. Long ere the Europeans arrived, a failure of the crop of rice, the principal food of India, has spread the devastations of famine over the populous plains of Bengal. And never, from the seven years famine of ancient Egypt to the present day, was there a natural fearcity in any country which did not enrich the proprietors of the granaries. The Mohammedan princes and Moorish traders have often added all the horrors of an artificial to a natural famine. But however some Portuguese or other governors may stand accused, much was left for the humanity of the more exalted policy of an Albuquerque or a Castro. And under such European governors as these, the distresses of the East have often been alleviated by a generosity of conduct, and a train of resources formerly unknown in Asia. The introduction of the British laws into India, of laws already admired as the dictates of heaven, must, in the course of ages, have a wide and stupendous effect. . The abject spirit of Asian submission, will be taught to see, and to claim those rights of nature, of which the dispirited and passive * Gentoos could, till lately, hardly form an idea. From this, as naturally as the noon succeeds the dawn, must the other blessings of civilization arise. And though the four great tribes of India are almost inaccessible to the introduction of other manners and of other literature than their own, happily there is one despised tribe, who are not bound by their superstition to reject the advantages which flow from an inter-community with civilized strangers. Nor may the political philosopher be deemed an enthusiast, who would boldly prophefy, that unless the British are driven from India, that tribe, the despised Hallachores, into which the refuse of the rest are now excommunicated, will in the course of a few centuries, from the advantages received from intercommunity, bear such a superiority over the others, that the others will be induced to break the shackles of their absurd superstitions, (which almost in every instance ‡ are contrary to the feelings and wishes of nature) and will be led to partake of those advantages which arise from the free scope and due cultivation of the rational powers. Nor can the obstinacy even of the conceited Chinese always resist the desire of imitating the Europeans, a people who in arts and in arms are so greatly superior to themselves. The use of the twenty-four letters, by which we can express every language, appeared at first as miraculous to the Chinese. Prejudice cannot always deprive that people, who are not deficient in selfish cunning, of the ease and expedition of an alphabet; and it is easy to foresee, that, in the course of a few centuries, some alphabet will certainly take place of the 60,000 arbitrary marks, which now render the cultivation of the Chinese literature not only a labour of the utmost difficulty, but even impossible to attain, beyond a very limited degree. And from the introduction of an alphabet, what improvements may not be expected from the laborious industry of the Chinese! Though most obstinately attached to their old customs, yet there is a tide in the manners of nations which is fudden and rapid, and which acts with a kind of instinctive fury against ancient prejudice and absurdity. It was that nation of merchants, the Phæni-

^{*} Mahommed Ali Khan, Nabob of the Carnatic, declared, " I met the British with that freedom of openness which they love, and I esteem it my honour as well as security to be the ally of such a nation of princes."

[•] See the note on the VII. Lufiad.

[†] Every man must follow his father's trade, and must marry a daughter of the same occupation. Innumerable are their other barbarous restrictions of genius and inclination.

cians, which diffused the use of letters through the ancient, and Commerce will undoubtedly diffuse the same blessings through the modern world.

To this view of the political happiness, which is sure to be introduced in proportion to civilization, let the Divine add what may be reasonably expected from such opportunity of the increase of Religion. A factory of merchants, indeed, has seldom been found to be the school of piety; yet, when the general manners of a people become assimilated to those of a more rational worship, something more than ever was produced by an infant mission, or the neighbourhood of an infant colony, may then be reasonably expected, and even foretold.

In estimating the political happiness of a people, nothing is of greater importance than their capacity of, and tendency to, improvement. As a dead lake will continue in the same state for ages and ages, so would the bigotry and superstitions of the East continue the same. But if the lake is begun to be opened into a thousand rivulets, who knows over what unnumbered fields, barren before, they may diffuse the blessings of fertility, and turn a dreary wilderness into a land of society and joy.

In contrast to this, let the Golden Coast and other immense regions of Africa be contemplated:

Afric behold; alas, what altered view!
Her lands uncultured, and her fons untrue;
Ungraced with all that fweetens human life,
Savage and fierce they roam in brutal strife;
Eager they grasp the gifts which culture yields,
Yet naked roam their own neglected fields....
Unnumber'd tribes as bestial grazers stray,
By laws unform'd, unform'd by Reason's sway.
Far inward stretch the mournful steril dales,
Where on the parch'd hill-side pale famine wails.

LUSIAD X.

Let us view what millions of these unhappy savages are dragged from their native sields, and cut off for ever from all the hopes and all the rights to which human birth entitled them. And who would hesitate to pronounce that Negro the greatest of patriots, who, by teaching his countrymen the arts of c 2 fociety, should teach them to defend themselves in the posfession of their fields, their families, and their own personal liberties?

Evident however at it is, that the voyages of Gama and Columbus have already carried a superior degree of happiness, and the promise of infinitely more, to the Eastern and Western worlds; yet the advantages derived from the discovery of these regions to Europe may perhaps be denied. But let us view what Europe was, ere the genius of Don Henry gave birth to the spirit of modern discovery.

Several ages before this period the feudal system had degenerated into the most absolute tyranny. The barons exercised the most despotic authority over their vassals, and every scheme of public utility was rendered impracticable by their continual petty wars with each other; and to which they led their dependends as dogs to the chace. Unable to read, or to write his own name, the Chieftain was entirely possessed by the most romantic opinion of military glory, and the fong of his domestic minstrel constituted his highest idea of fame. The Classics flept on the shelves of the monastries, their dark, but happy afylum, while the life of the monks resembled that of the fattened beeves which loaded their tables. Real abilities were indeed possessed by a Duns Scotus and a few others; but these were lost in the most trifling subtleties of a sophistry, which they dignified with the name of casuistical Divinity. Whether Adam and Eve were created with navels, and how many thoufand angels might at the same instant dance upon the point of the finest needle without one jostling another, were two of the feveral topics of like importance which excited the acumen and engaged the controversies of the Learned. While every branch of philosophical, of rational investigation, was thus unpursued and unknown, Commerce, incompatible in itself with the feodal fystem, was equally neglected and unimproved. Where the mind is enlarged and enlightened by Learning, plans of Commerce will rife into action, and which, in return, will, from every part of the earth, bring new acquirements to philosophy and science. The birth of Learning and Commerce may be different, but their growth is mutual and dependent upon each other. They not only affift each other, but the same enlargement of mind which is necessary for perfection dependant,

in the one, is also necessary for perfection in the other; and the same causes impede, and are alike destructive of both: The Intercourse of mankind is the parent of both. According to the confinement or extent of Intercourse, barbarity or civilization proportionably prevail. In the dark Monkish ages, the Intercourse of the learned was as much impeded and confined as that of the merchant. A few unwieldy vessels coasted the shores of Europe, and mendicant friars and ignorant pilgrims carried a miserable account of what was passing in the world from monastery to monastery. What Doctor had last disputed on the peripatetic philosophy at some university; and what new herefy had last appeared, comprised the whole of their literary intelligence; and which was delivered with little accuracy, and received with as little attention. While this thick cloud of mental darkness overspread the western world, was Don Henry prince of Portugal born, born to fet mankind free from the feodal system, and to give to the whole world every advantage, every light that may possibly be diffused by the Intercourse of unlimited commerce:

The rifing world of Trade: the Genius, then,
Of Navigation, that in hopeless sloth
Had slumber'd on the vast Atlantic deep
For idle ages, starting heard at last
The Lusitanian Prince, who, heaven-inspir'd,
To love of useful glory rous'd mankind,
And in unbounded Commerce mixt the world.

Thom.

In contrast to the melancholy view of human nature, sunk in barbarism and benighted with ignorance, let the present state of Europe be impartially estimated. Yet though the great increase of opulence and learning cannot be denied, there are some who affert, that virtue and happiness have as greatly declined. And the immense overslow of riches, from the East in particular, has been pronounced big with destruction to the British empire. Every thing human, it is true, has its dark as well as its bright side; but let these popular complaints be examined, and it will be found, that modern Europe, and the British empire in a very particular manner, have received the greatest and most solid advantages from the modern enlarged system of Commerce

merce. The magic of the old romances, which could make the most withered, deformed hag, appear as the most beautiful virgin, is every day verified in popular declamation. Ancient days are there painted in the most amiable simplicity, and the modern in the most odious colours. Yet what man of fortune in England lives in that stupendous gross luxury, which every day was exhibited in the Gothic castles of the old Chiestains! Four or five hundred knights and squires in the domestic retinue of a warlike earl was not uncommon, nor was the pomp of embroidery inferior to the prosuse waste of their tables; in both instances unequalled by all the mad excesses of the present age.

While the Baron thus lived in all the wild glare of Gothic luxury, agriculture was almost totally neglected, and his meaner vasfals fared harder, infinitely less comfortably, than the meanest industrious labourers of England do now. Where the lands are uncultivated, the peafants, ill-cloathed, ill-lodged, and poorly fed, pass their miserable days in sloth and filth, totally ignorant of every advantage, of every comfort which nature lays at their feet. He who passes from the trading towns and cultured fields of England, to those remote villages of Scotland or Ireland, which claim this description, is astonished at the comparative wretchedness of their destitute inhabitants; but few consider, that these villages only exhibit a view of what Europe was, ere the spirit of Commerce diffused the blessings which naturally flow from her improvements. In the Hebrides the failure of a harvest almost depopulates an island. Having little or no traffic to purchase grain, numbers of the young and hale betake themselves to the continent in quest of employment and food, leaving a few, less adventurous, behind, to beget a new race, the heirs of the same fortune. Yet, from the same cause, from the want of traffic, the kingdom of England has often felt more dreadful effects than these. Even in the days when her Henries and Edwards plumed themselves with the trophies of France, how often has Famine spread all her horrors over city and village? Our modern histories neglect this characteristical feature of ancient days; but the rude chronicles of these ages inform us, that three or four times, in almost every reign of continuance, was England thus visited. The failure of the crop was then severely felt, and two bad harvests together were almost insupportable. But Commerce has now opened another scene, has armed armed Government with the happiest power that can be exerted by the rulers of a nation; the power to prevent every extremity which may possibly arise from bad harvests; extremities, which, in former ages, were esteemed more dreadful visitations of the wrath of heaven, than the pestilence itself. Yet modern London is not so certainly defended against the latter, its antient visitor in almost every reign, than the Commonwealth by the means of Commerce, under a just and humane government, is secured against the ravages of the former. If, from these great outlines of the happiness enjoyed by a commercial over an uncommercial nation, we turn our eyes to the manners, the advantages will be found no less in favour of the civilized.

Whoever is inclined to declaim on the vices of the prefent age, let him read, and be convinced, that the Gothic ones were less virtuous. If the spirit of chivalry prevented effeminacy, it was the foster-father of a ferocity of manners, now happily unknown. Rapacity, avarice, and effeminacy are the vices ascribed to the increase of Commerce; and in some degree, it must be confessed, they follow her steps. Yet infinitely more dreadful, as every palatinate in Europe often felt, were the effects of the two first under the feodal Lords, than possibly can be experienced under any system of trade. virtues and vices of human nature are the same in every age: they only receive different modifications, and are dormant or awaked into action under different circumstances. The feodal Lord had it infinitely more in his power to be rapacious than the merchant. And whatever avarice may attend the trader, his intercourse with the rest of mankind lifts him greatly above that brutish ferocity which actuates the savage, often the rustic, and in general characterises the ignorant part of mankind. The abolition of the feodal system, a system of absolute flavery, and that equality of mankind, which affords the protection of property, and every other incitement to industry, are the glorious gifts which the spirit of Commerce, awaked by prince Henry of Portugal, has bestowed upon Europe in general; and, as if directed by the manes of his mother, a daughter of England, upon the British empire in particular. In the vice of effeminacy alone, perhaps, do we exceed our ancestors; yet even here we have infinitely the advantage over them. The brutal ferocity of former ages is now lost, and the general mind is humanised. The savage breast is the native soil of revenge; a vice, of all others, ingratitude excepted, peculiarly stampt with the character of hell. But the mention of this was reserved for the character of the savages of Europe. The savage of every country is implacable when injured, but among fome, revenge has its measure. The wilds of America hear the hostile parties join in their mutual lamentations over the murdered, and whom, as an oblivion of malice, they bury together. But the measure of revenge, never to be full, was left for the demisavages of Europe. The vassals of the feudal Lord entered into his quarrels with the most inexorable rage. Just or unjust was no consideration of theirs. It was a family feud; no farther enquiry was made; and from age to age, the parties, who never injured each other, breathed nothing but mutual rancour and revenge. And actions, suitable to this horrid spirit, every where confessed its violent influence. Such were the late days of Europe, admired by the ignorant for the innocence of manners. Refentment of injury indeed is natural; and there is a degree which is honest, and though warm, far from inhuman. But if it is the hard task of humanised virtue to preserve the feeling of an injury unmixt with the flightest criminal wish of revenge, how impossible is it for the savage, to attain the dignity of forgiveness, the greatest ornament of human nature. As in individuals, a virtue will rife into a vice, generosity into blind profusion, and even mercy into criminal lenity, so civilifed manners will lead the opulent into effeminacy. But let it be considered, this consequence is by no means the certain result of civilization. Civilization, on the contrary, provides the certain preventive of this evil. When refinement degenerates into whatever enervates the mind, whenever frivolousness predominates, literary ignorance is sure to complete the effeminate character. A mediocrity of virtues and of talents is the lot of the great majority of mankind; and even this mediocrity, if cultivated by a liberal education, will infallibly fecure its possessfor against those excesses of effeminacy which are really culpable. To be of plain manners it is not necessary to be a clown, or to wear coarse cloaths; nor is it necessary to

^{*} Extremity; for it were both highly unjust and impolitic in government, to allow importation in such a degree as might be destructive of domestic agriculture, when there is a real failure of the harvest.

to lie on the ground and feed like the favage, to be truly manly. The beggar who, behind the hedge, divides his offals with his dog, has often more of the real sensualist than he who dines at an elegant table. Nor need we hesitate to assert, that he who, unable to preserve a manly elegance of manners, degenerates into the petit maitre, would have been, in any age or condition, equally infignificant and worthless. Some, when they talk of the debauchery of the present age, seem to think that the former were all innocence. But this is ignorance of human nature. The debauchery of a barbarous age is gross and brutal; that of a gloomy superstitious one, secret, excessive, and murderous: that of a more polished one, not to make an apology, much happier for the fair fex *, and certainly not so bad. If one disease has been imported from Spanish America, the most valuable medicines have likewise been brought from these regions; and distempers, which were thought invincible by our forefathers, are now cured. If the luxuries of the Indies usher disease to our tables, the consequence is not unknown; the wife and the temperate receive no injury, and intemperance has been the destroyer of mankind in every age. The opulence of ancient Rome produced a luxury of manners which proved fatal to that mighty empire. But the effeminate sensualists of these ages were not men of intellectual cultivation. The enlarged ideas, the generous and manly feelings, inspired by a liberal education, were utterly unknown to them. Unformed by that wisdom which arises from science, they were gross barbarians, dressed in the mere outward tinsel of civilization +. Where

† The degeneracy of the Roman literature preceded the fate of the state, and the reason is obvious. The men of fortune grew frivolous, and superficial in every branch of knowledge, and were therefore unable to hold the reigns of empire. The degeneracy of literary taste is, therefore, the surest proof of the general ignorance. However foreigners may justly despise our theatrical taste, the justice of their contempt by no means fixes a stain on the national. A London audience is chiefly composed of those ranks who never, in any country, had any pretension to lietrary taste. Manly criticism, and every discussion of philosophy, never appeared in greater lustre than in the present age; and English literature is the study of Europe.

literary

^{*} Even that warm admirer of favage happiness, the Author of Histoire Philosophique & Politique des Etablissemens, &c. confesses, that the wild Americans feem destitute of the feeling of love. In a little while, fays he, when the heat of passion is gratified, they lose all affection and attachment for their women, whom they degrade to the most servile offices. - A tender remembrance of the first endearments, a generous participation of care and hope, the compaffionate sentiments of honour; all these delicate feelings, which arise into affection and bind attachment, are indeed incompatible with the ferocious and gross fensations of the barbarian of any country.

the enthusiasm of military honour characterises the rank of gentlemen, that nation will rife into empire. But no sooner does conquest give a continued security, than the mere foldier degenerates; and the old veterans are foon succeeded by a new generation, illiterate as their fathers, but destitute of their virtues and experience. Luxury prevails; titles and family are the only merit, and the whole body of the nobility are utterly ignorant of the principles of commerce and true policy. A stately grandeur is preserved, but it is only outward, all is decayed within, and on the first storm the weak fabrick falls to the dust. Thus rose and thus fell the empire of Rome, and the much wider one of Portugal. But most essentially different from this is the present character of the British nation: Science and every branch of liberal study have here taken deep root, and spread their fruitful boughs wide over the unrivalled empire. Our politicians of the day may declaim as ignorant passion leads them, but the true character of the present age, compared with that of the last and the preceding centuries, does honour to human nature. Neither do the flavish principles of the Royalists of the last century, nor the unconstitutional fury of the Republicans, constitute the present general character. A spirit more manly than that of the former. more rational, more liberal than that of both, predominates in every branch of the people. The weakness of effeminacy has neither appeared in the Camp nor in the Senate. The advantages of cultivated talents, on the contrary, never shone forth with greater lustre, than the present age has beheld them displayed, in the disputes of the Senate and in the arts of war. And if thus we are defended against the evils of effeminacy, we may also presume, that the same liberal cultivation of the minds of the Great will preserve us from those evils which other nations have suffered from the sudden influx of enormous wealth. The wisdom of legislature might certainly have prevented every evil which Spain and Portugal have experienced from their acquisitions in the two Indies*. But what other than the total eclipse of their glory could be expected from a nobility, rude and unlettered as those of Portugal are described by the author of the Lusiad, a court and nobility, who sealed the truth of all his complaints against them, by suffering that great man, the light of their age, to die in an alms-house! What but the fall of their state could be expected from barbarians like these! Nor can the annals of mankind produce one instance of the fall of empire, where the character of the grandees was other than that ascribed to his countrymen by Camoens.

The foldiers and navigators were the only confiderable gainers by their acquirements in the Indies. Though agriculture and manufactory are the natural strength of a nation; and though the true use of colonization is to increase these in the mother country, these received little or no increase in Spain and Portugal by the great acquisitions of these crowns. But of this hereaster.

No lesson can be of greater national importance than the history of the rise and the fall of a commercial empire. The view of what advantages were acquired, and of what might have been still added; the means by which such empire might have been continued, and the errors by which it was lost, are as particularly conspicuous in the naval and commercial history of Portugal, as if Providence had intended to give a lasting example to mankind; a chart, where the course of the safe voyage is pointed out, and where the shelves and rocks, and the seasons of tempest are discovered, and foretold.

The history of Portugal, as a naval and commercial power, begins with the designs of Prince Henry. But as the enterprizes of this great man, and the completion of his designs are intimately connected with the state of Portugal, a short view of the progress of the power, and of the character of that kingdom, will be necessary to elucidate the history of the revival of commerce, and the subject of the Lusiad.

During the centuries, when the effeminated Roman provinces of Europe were desolated by the irruptions of northern or Scythian barbarians, the Saracens, originally a wandering banditti of Asiatic Scythia, spread the same horrors of brutal conquest over the finest countries of the castern world. The northern conquerors of the finer provinces of Europe embraced the Christian religion as professed by the monks, and, contented with the luxuries of their new settlements, their military spirit soon declined. Their ancient brothers, the Saracens, on the other hand, having embraced the religion of Mohammed, their rage of war received every addition which may possibly be inspired by religious enthusiasm. Not only the spoils of the vanquished, but their beloved Paradise itself was to be obtained by their fabres, by extending the faith of their prophet by force of arms and usurpation of dominion. Strengthened and inspired by a commission which they esteemed divine, the rapidity of their conquests far exceeded those of the Goths and A great majority of the inhabitants of every country they subdued embraced their religion, imbibed their principles, united in their views, and the professors Mohammedism became the most formidable combination that ever was leagued together against the rest of mankind. Morocco and the adjacent countries, at this time amazingly populous, had now received the doctrines of the Koran, and incorporated with the Saracens. And the Turkish arms spread slaughter and desolation from the fouth of Spain to Italy and the islands of the Mediterranean. All the rapine and carnage committed by the Gothic conquerors were now amply returned on their less warlike posterity. In Spain, and the province now called Portugal, the Mohammedans erected powerful kingdoms, and their lust of conquest threatened destruction to every Christian power. But a romantic military spirit revived in Europe, under the auspices of Charlemagne. The Mohammedans, during the reign of this sovereign, made a most formidable irruption into Europe, and France in particular felt the weight of their fury; when that political monarch, by inventing new military honours, drew the adventurous youth of every Christian power to his standards, and in fact, a circumstance, however neglected by historians, gave birth to the Crusades, the beginning of which, in propriety, ought to be dated from his reign. Few indeed are the historians of this period, but enough remain to prove that though the writers of the old romance seized upon it, though they gave full room to the wildest slights of imagination, and added the inexhaustible machinery of magic to the adventures of their heroes, yet the origin of their fictions was founded on historical facts*. Yet, however this period may thus resemble the fabulous ages of Greece, certain it is, that an Orlando, a Rinaldo, a Rugero, and other celebrated names in romance, ^{*} Ariosto, who adopted the legends of the old romance, chose this period for the subject of his Orlando Furioso. Paris besieged by the Saracens, Orlando and the other Christian knights assemble in aid of Charlemagne, who are opposed in their amours and in battle by Rodomont, Ferraw, and other insidel knights. That there was a noted Moorish Spaniard, named Ferraw, a redoubted champion of that age, we have the testimony of Marcus Antonius Sabellicus, a writer of note of the sisteenth century.

acquired

acquired great honour in the wars which were waged against the Saracens, the invaders of Europe. In these romantic wars, by which the power of the Mohammedans was checked, feveral centuries elapsed, when Alonzo, king of Castile, apprehensive that the whole force of the Mohammedans of Spain and Morocco was ready to fall upon him, prudently imitated the conduct of Charlemagne. He availed himself of the spirit of chivalry, and demanded leave of Philip I. of France, and of other princes, that volunteers from their dominions might be allowed to distinguish themselves under his banners against the insidels. His desire was no sooner known, than a brave romantic army thronged to his standards, and Alonzo was victorious. Honours and endowments were liberally distributed among the champions, and to one of the bravest of them, to Henry*, a younger son of the duke of Burgundy, he gave his daughter Terefa in marriage, with the fovereignty of the countries south of Galicia in dowry, commissioning him to extend his dominions by the expulsion of the Moors. Henry, who reigned by the title of Count, improved every advantage which offered. The two rich provinces of Entro Minho e Douro, and Fra los Montes, dra des mandes yielded to his arms; great part of Beira also was subdued, and the Moorish king of Lamego became his tributary. Many thousands of Christians, who had lived in miserable subjection to the Moors, or in desolate independency in the mountains, took shelter under the generous protection of Count Henry. Great numbers also of the Moors changed their religion, and chose rather to continue in the land where they were born, under a mild government, than be exposed to the severities and injustice of their native governors. And thus, on one of the most ‡ beautiful and fertile spots of the world, and in the finest climate, in consequence of a Crusade + against the Mohammedans, was established the sovereignty of Portugal, a fovereignty which in time spread its influence over the world, and gave a new face to the manners of nations.

Count Henry, after a successful reign, was succeeded by his infant son Don Alonzo-Henry, who having surmounted several

See the notes on page 94 and 95.

† Small indeed in extent, but so rich in fertility, that it was called Medulla Hispanica,
The marrow of Spain. Vid. Resandii Antiq. Lust. 1. iii.

[†] In propriety most certainly a Crusade, though that term has never before been applied dangers which threatened his youth*, became the founder of the Portuguese monarchy. In 1139 the Moors of Spain and Barbary united their forces to recover the dominions from which they had been driven by the Christians. According to the lowest accounts of the Portuguese writers, the army of the Moors amounted to near 400,000; nor is this number incredible, when we consider what armies they at other times brought to the field, and that at this time they came to take possession of the lands they expected to conquer. Don Alonzo, however, with a very small army, gave them battle on the plains of Ourique, and after a struggle of six hours, obtained a most glorious and compleat + victory, and which was crowned with an event of the utmost importance. On the field of battle Don Alonzo was proclaimed King of Portugal by his victorious foldiers, and he in return conferred the rank of nobility on the whole army. But the constitution of the monarchy was not settled, nor was Alonzo invested with the Regalia till six years after this memorable victory. The government the Portuguese had experienced under the Spaniards and Moors, and the advantages which they saw were derived from their own valour, had taught them a love of liberty, which was not to be complimented away in the joy of victory, or by the shouts of tumult. Alonzo himself understood their spirit too well to make the least attempt to erect himself a despotic Monarch, nor did he discover the least inclination to destroy that bold consciousness of freedom which had enabled his army to conquer and elect him their Sovereign. After fix years spent in farther victories, in extending and fecuring his dominions, he called an affembly of the prelates, nobility and commons, to meet at Lamego. When the affembly opened, Alonzo appeared feated on the throne, but without any other mark of regal dignity. And ere he was crowned, the constitution of the state was settled, and eighteen statutes were folemnly confirmed by oath ‡ as the charter of king and people; statutes diametrically opposite to the jure divinoand arbitrary power of kings, to the principles which in-

^{*} See the note on page 96.

⁺ For an account of this battle, and the coronation of the first king of Portugal, see the note, p. 105.

1 The power of deposing, and of electing their kings, under certain circumstances, is vested in the people by the statutes of Lamego. See the notes, p. 106 and 160.

culcate and demand the unlimited passive obedience of the subject.

Conscious of what they owed to their own valour, the founders of the Portuguese monarchy transmitted to their heirs those generous principles of liberty which compleat and adorn the martial character. The ardour of the volunteer, an ardour unknown to the slave and the mercenary, added to the most romantic ideas of military glory, characterised the Portuguese under the reigns of their first monarchs. In almost continual wars with the Moors, this spirit, on which the existence of their kingdom depended, rose higher and higher; and the desire to extirpate Mohammedism, the principle which animated the wish of victory in every battle, seemed to take deeper root in every age. Such were the manners, and such the principles of the people who were governed by the successors of Alonzo the First, a succession of great men, who proved themselves worthy to reign over so military and enterprising a nation.

By a continued train of victories Portugal increased considerably in strength, and the Portuguese had the honour to drive the Moors from Europe. The invasions of these people were now requited by successful expeditions into Africa. And such was the manly spirit of these ages, that the statutes of Lamego received additional articles in favour of liberty, a convincing proof that the general heroism of a people depends upon the principles of freedom. Alonzo IV. + though not an amiable character, was perhaps the greatest warrior, politician, and monarch of his age. After a reign of military splendor he left his throne to his son Pedro, who from his inflexible justice was furnamed the Just, or, the Lover of Justice. The ideas of equity and literature were now diffused by this great I prince, who was himself a polite scholar, and most accomplished gentleman. And Portugal began to perceive the advantages of cultivated talents, and to feel its superiority over the barbarous politics of the ignorant Moors. The great Pedro, however, was succeeded by a weak prince, and the heroic spirit of the Portuguese seemed to exist no more under his son Fernando, surnamed the Careless.

[†] For the character of this prince, fee the note, p. 136. ‡ For anecdotes of this monarch, fee the notes, p. 138 and 140.

But the general character of the people was too deeply impressed to be obliterated by one inglorious reign, and under John I. § all the virtues of the Portuguese shone forth with redoubled lustre. Happy for Portugal his father bestowed a most excellent education upon this prince, which added to, and improving his great natural talents, rendered him one of the greatest of monarchs. Conscious of the superiority which his own liberal education gave him, he was assiduous to bestow the same advantages upon his children, and he himself often became their preceptor in the branches of science and useful knowledge. Fortunate in all his affairs, he was most of all fortunate in his family. He had many fons, and he lived to fee them men, men of parts and of action, whose only emulation was to shew affection to his person, and to support his administration by their great abilities.

There is fomething exceeding pleafing in reading the history of a family which shews human nature in its most exalted virtues and most amiable colours; and the tribute of veneration is spontaneously paid to the father who distinguishes the different talents of his children, and places them in the proper lines of action. All the fons of John excelled in military exercises, and in the literature of their age; Don Edward and Don * Pedro were particularly educated for the cabinet, and the mathematical genius of Don Henry, one of his youngest sons, received every encouragement which a king and a father could give, to ripen it into perfection and public utility.

History was well known to Prince Henry, and his turn of mind peculiarly enabled him to make political observations upon it. The wealth and power of ancient Tyre and Carthage shewed him what a maritime nation might hope; and the flourishing colonies of the Greeks were the frequent topic of his conversation. Where the Grecian commerce, confined as it the preserver of the l'ortuguese monarchy. See the notes, p. 146 and 148.

§ This great prince was the natural fon of Pedro the Just. Some years after the murder of his beloved spouse Inez de Castro (of which see the text and notes, p. 130, &c.) lest his sather, whose severe temper he too well knew, should force him into a disagreeable marriage, Don Pedro commenced an amour with a Galician lady, who became the mother of John I.

The sons of John, who figure in history, were Edward, Juan, Fernando, Pedro, and Henry. Edward succeeded his father, (for whose reign and character, see the note p. 169.) Juan, distinguished both in the camp and cabinet, in the reign of his brother Edward had the honour to oppose the wild expedition against Tangier, which was proposed by his brother Fernando, in whose perpetual captivity it ended. Of Pedro asterwards.

was, extended its influence, the deferts became cultivated fields. cities rose, and men were drawn from the woods and caverns to unite in fociety. The Romans, on the other hand, when they destroyed Carthage, buried in her ruins, the fountain of civilization, of improvement and opulence. They extinguished the spirit of commerce; the agriculture of the conquered nations, Britannia * alone, perhaps, excepted, was totally neglected. And thus, while the luxury of Rome confumed the wealth of her provinces, her uncommercial policy dried up the fources of its continuance. The egregious errors of the Romans, who perceived not the true use of their distant conquests, and the inexhaustible fountains of opulence which Phænicia had established in her colonies, instructed Prince Henry what gifts to bestow upon his country, and in the result upon the whole world. Nor were the inestimable advantages of commerce the fole motives of Henry. All the ardour that the love of his country could awake, conspired to stimulate the natural turn of his genius for the improvement of navigation.

As the kingdom of Portugal had been wrested from the Moors and established by conquest, so its existence still subsisted on the Superiority of the force of arms; and ere the birth of Henry, the superiority of the Portuguese navies had been of the utmost confequence to the protection of the state. Whatever therefore might curb or ruin the power of the Moors, was of the last importance to the existence of Portugal. Such were the views and the circumstances which united to inspire the designs of Henry, all which were powerfully enforced and invigorated by the religion of that prince. The defire to extirpate Mohammedism was patriotism in Portugal. It was the principle which gave birth to, and supported their monarchy. Their kings avowed it, and Prince Henry, the piety of whose heart cannot be questioned, always professed, that to propagate the gospel and extirpate Mohammedism, was the great purpose of his designs and enterprizes. And however both the one and the other, in the for feveral ages after, the Romans drew immense quantities of wheat from their British province.

The honour of this is due to Agricola. He employed his legions in cutting down forests and in clearing marshes. And event, were + neglected, certain it is, that the same principles inspired, and were & always professed by king Emmanuel, under whom the Eastern World was discovered by Gama.

The Crusades, to rescue the Holy Land from the infidels, which, however unregarded by historians, had already been of the greatest political service to Spain, and Portugal, | began now to have some effect upon the commerce of Europe. The Hans Towns had received charters of liberty, and had united together for the protection of their trade against the numerous pyrates of the Baltic. A people of Italy, known by the name of the Lombards, had opened a lucrative traffic with the ports of Egypt, from whence they imported into Europe the riches of India; and Bruges in Flanders, the mart between them and the Hans Towns was, in consequence, surrounded with the best agriculture of these ages ‡. A certain proof of the dependance of agriculture upon the extent of commerce. Yet though these gleams of light, as morning stars, began to appear, it was not the gross multitude, it was only the eye of a Henry which could perceive what they prognosticated, and it was only a genius like his which could prevent them from again fetting in the depths of night. The Hans Towns were liable to be buried in the victories of a Tyrant, and the trade with Egypt was exceedingly insecure and precarious. Europe was still enveloped in the dark mists of ignorance, and though the mariner's compass was invented before the birth of Henry, it was improved to no naval advantage. Traffic still crept, in an infant state, along the coasts, nor were the construction of ships adapted for other voyages. One successful Tyrant might have overwhelmed the system and extinguished the spirit of com-

England the greatest service, by introducing the present system of agriculture. Where trade increases, men's thoughts are set in action; hence the increase of food which is wanted, is supplied by a redoubled attention to husbandry; and hence it was that agriculture was of old improved and diffused by the Phænician colonies. Some Theorists complain of the number of lives which are lost by navigation, but they totally forget that commerce is the parent of population.

⁺ Neglected in the idea of the commanders; the idea of Henry however was greatly fulfilled. For the dominion of the Portuguese in the Indian sea cut the sinews of the Egyptian and other Mohammedan powers. But of this afterwards.

[§] See the notes, p. 432.

^{||} See the note, p. 277.

† Flanders has been the school-mistress of husbandry to Europe. Sir Charles Liste, a Royalist, resided in this country several years during the usurpation of the Regicides; and after the Restoration, rendered merce, for it stood on a much narrower and much feebler basis, than in the days of Phænician and Grecian colonization. Yet these mighty fabricks, many centuries before, had been swallowed up in the desolations of unpolitical conquest. A broader and more permanent soundation of commerce than the world had yet seen, an universal basis, was yet wanting to bless mankind, and Henry Duke of Visco was born to give it.

On purpose to promote his designs, Prince Henry was by his father stationed the Commander in chief of the Portuguese forces in Africa. He had already, in 1412, three years before the reduction of Ceuta+, sent a ship to make discoveries on the Barbary coast. Cape Nams, as its name intimates, was then the Ne plus ultra of European navigation; the ship fent by Henry however passed it sixty leagues, and reached Cape Bojador. Encouraged by this beginning, the Prince while he was in Africa acquired whatever information the most intelligent of the Moors of Fez and Morocco could give. About a league and one half from the Cape of St. Vincent, in the kingdom of Algarve, Don Henry had observed a small but commodious situation for a fea-port town. On this spot, supposed the Promontorium Sacrum of the Romans, he built his town of Sagrez, by much the best planned and fortified of any in Portugal. Here, where the view of the ocean, says Faria, inspired his hopes and endeavours, he erected his arsenals, and built and harboured his ships. And here, leaving the temporary bustle and cares of the state to his father and brothers, he retired like a philosopher from the world, on purpose to render his studies of the utmost importance to its happiness. Having received all the light which could be discovered in Africa, he continued unwearied in his mathematical and geographical studies; the art of ship-building received amazing improvement under his direction, and the truth of his ideas of the structure of the terraqueous globe are now confirmed. He it was who first fuggested the use of the compass, and of longitude and latitude. in navigation, and how these might be ascertained by astrono-

[†] At the reduction of Ceuta, and other engagements in Africa, Prince Henry displayed a military genius and valour of the first magnitude. The important fortress of Ceuta was in a manner won by his own fword. Yet though even possessed by the enthusiasm of chivalry, his genius for navigation prevailed, and confined him to the rock of Sagrez.

[§] Nam, in Portuguese, a negative.

mical observations, suggestions and discoveries which would have held no fecond place among the conjectures of a Bacon, or the improvements of a Newton. Naval adventurers were now invited from all parts to the town of Sagrez, and in 1418 Juan Gonfalez Zarco and Tristran Vaz set sail on an expedition of discovery, the circumstances of which give us a striking picture of the state of navigation, ere it was new modelled by the genius of Henry.

Cape Bojador, so named from its extent*, runs about forty leagues to the westward, and for about fix leagues off land there is a most violent current, which dashing upon the shelves, makes a tempestuous sea. This was deemed impassible, for it was not confidered, that by standing out to the ocean the current might be avoided. To pass this formidable cape was the commission of Zarco and Vaz, who were also ordered to proceed as far as they could to discover the African coast, which, according to the information given to Henry by the Moors and Arabs, extended at least to the equinoctial line. Zarco and Vaz, however, lost their course in a storm, and were driven to a little island, which, in the joy of their deliverance, they named Puerto Santo, or the Holy Haven. Nor was Prince Henry, on their return, less joyful of their discovery, than they had been of their escape: A striking proof of the miserable state of navigation; for this island is only the voyage of a few days, in favourable weather, from the promontary of Sagrez.

The Discoverers of Puerto Santo, accompanied by Bartholomew Perestrello, were with three ships sent out on farther trial. Perestrello, having sowed some seeds and left some cattle on Holy Haven, returned to Portugal ‡. But Zarco and Vaz directing their course southward, in 1419, perceived something like a cloud on the water, and failing toward it, discovered and island covered with wood, which from thence they named Madeira. And this rich and beautiful island, which soon yielded a considerable revenue, was the first reward of the enterprizes of Prince Henry.

• Forty leagues appeared as a vast distance to the failors of that age, who named this

Cape Bojador, from the Spanish, bojar, to compass or go about.

† Unluckily also were left on this island two rabbits, whose young so increased, that in a few years it was found not habitable, every vegetable being destroyed by the great increase of these animals.

If the Duke of Viseo's liberal ideas of establishing colonies, those sinews of a commercial state, or his views of African and Indian commerce, were too refined to strike the gross multitude; yet other advantages refulting from his defigns, one would conclude, were self-evident. Nature calls upon Portugal to be a maritime power, and her naval superiority over the Moors; was, in the time of Henry, the surest defence of her existence as a kingdom. Yet though all his labours tended to establish that naval superiority on the surest basis, though even the religion of the age added its authority to the clearest political principles in favour of Henry; yet were his enterprizes and his expected discoveries derided with all the insolence of ignorance and bitterness of popular clamour. Barren deserts like Lybia, it was faid, were all that could be found, and a thousand difadvantages, drawn from these data, were foreseen and forctold. The great mind and better knowledge of Henry, however, were not thus to be shaken. Though twelve years from the discovery of Madeira had elapsed in unsuccessful endeavours to carry his navigation farther, he was now more happy; for one of his captains, named Galianez, in 1434 passed the Cape of Bojador, till then invincible; an action, says Faria, in the common opinion, not inferior to the labours of Hercules.

Gilianez, the next year, accompanied by Gonfalez Baldaya, carried his discoveries many leagues farther. Having put two horsemen on shore, to discover the face of the country, the adventurers, after riding several hours, saw nineteen men armed with javelins. The natives fled, and the two horsemen purfued, till one of the Portuguese, being wounded, lost the first blood that was facrificed to the new system of commerce. A small beginning, a very small streamlet, some perhaps may exclaim, but which foon swelled into oceans, and deluged the eastern and western worlds. Let such philosophers, however, be desired to name the design of public utility, which has been unpolluted by the depravity of the human passions. To suppose that Heaven itself could give an institution which could not be perverted, and to suppose no previous alteration in human, nature, is a contradiction in proposition; for as human nature now exists, power cannot be equally possessed by all, and whenever the selfish or vicious passions predominate, that power will certainly be abused. The cruelties therefore of Cortez, and that more horrid barbarian Pizarro*, are no more to be charged upon Don Henry and Columbus, than the villainies of the Jesuits and the horrors of the Inquisition are to be ascribed to him, whose precepts are summed up in the great command, To do to your neighbour as you would wish your neighbour to do to you. But if it is still alledged that he who plans a discovery ought to foresee the miseries which the vicious will engraft upon his enterprize, let the objector be told, that the miseries are uncertain, while the advantages are real and sure; and that the true philosopher will not confine his eye to the Spanish campaigns in Mexico and Peru, but will extend his prospect to all the inestimable benefits, all the improvements of laws, opinions, and of manners, which have been introduced by the intercourse of universal commerce.

In 1440 Anthony Gonsalez brought some Moors prisoners to Lisbon. These he took two and forty leagues beyond Cape Bojador, and in 1442 he returned with his captives. One Moor escaped, but ten blacks of Guinea and a considerable quantity

* Some eminent writers, both at home and abroad, have of late endeavoured to foften the character of Cortez, and have urged the necessity of war for the slaughters he committed. These authors have also greatly sostened the horrid seatures of the Mexicans. If one, however, would trace the true character of Cortez and the Americans, he must have recourse to the numerous Spanish writers, who were either witnesses of the first wars, or soon after travelled in these countries. In these he will find many anecdotes which afford a light, not to be found in our modernised histories. In these it will be found, that Cortez set out to take gold by force, and not by establishing any system of commerce with the natives, the only just reason of effecting a settlement in a foreign country. He was asked by various states, what commodities or drugs he wanted, and was promifed abundant supply. He and his Spaniards, he answered, had a disease at their hearts, which nothing but gold could cure; and he received intelligence, that Mexico abounded with it. Under pretence of a friendly conference, he made Montezuma his prifoner, and ordered him to pay tribute to Charles V. Immense sums were paid, but the demand was boundlefs. Tumults enfued. Cortez displayed amazing generalship, and some millions of those, who in enumerating to the Spaniards the greatness of Montezuma, boasted that his yearly sacrifices consumed 20,000 men, were now facrificed to the disease of Cortez's heart. Pizarro, however, in the barbarity of his foul, far exceeded him. There is a very bright fide of the character of Cortez. If we forget that his avarice was the cause of a most unjust and most bloody war, in every other respect he will appear one of the greatest of heroes. But Pizarro is a character completely detestable, destitute of every spark of generosity. He massacred the Peruvians, he said, because they were barbarians, and he himself could not read. Atabalipa, amazed at the art of reading, got a Spaniard to write the word Dios (the Spanish for God) on his finger. On trying if the Spaniards agreed in what it fignified, he discovered that Pizarro could not read. And Pizarro, in revenge of the contempt he perceived in the face of Atabalipa, ordered that prince to be tried for his life, for having concubines, and being an idolater. Atabalipa was condemned to be burn-ed; but on submitting to baptism, he was only hanged.

of gold dust were given in ransom for two others. A rivulet at the place of landing was named by Gonsalez, Rio del Oro, or the River of Gold. And the islands of Adeget, Arguim, and de las Garças, were now discovered.

The Guinea blacks, the first ever feen in Portugal, and the gold dust, excited other passions beside admiration. A company was formed at Lagos, under the auspices of Prince Henry, to carry on a traffic with the new discovered countries; and as the Portuguese considered themselves in a state of continual hostility with the Moors, about two hundred of these people, inhabitants of the Islands of Nar and Tider, in 1444, were brought prisoners to Portugal. And Gonzalo de Cintra was the next year attacked by the Moors, fourteen leagues beyond Rio del

Oro, where with feven of his men he was killed.

This hostile proceeding displeased Prince Henry, and in 1446 Anthony Gonsalez and two other captains were sent to enter into a treaty of peace and traffic with the natives of Rio del Oro, and also to attempt their conversion. But these proposals were rejected by the barbarians, one of whom, however, came voluntarily to Portugal, and Juan Fernandez remained with the natives, to observe their manners and the products of the country. In the year following Fernandez was found in good health and brought home to Portugal. The account he gave of the country and people affords a striking instance of the misery of barbarians. The land an open, barren, fandy plain, where the wandering natives were guided in their journeys by the stars and flights of birds; their food milk, lizards, locusts, and such herbs as the soil produced without culture; and their only defence from the scorching heat of the sun some miserable tents which they pitch as occasion requires on the burning sands.

In 1447 upwards of thirty ships followed the route of traffic which was now opened; and John de Castilla obtained the infamy to stand the first on the list of those names, whose villanies have disgraced the spirit of commerce, and afforded the loudest complaints against the progress of navigation. Dissatisfied with the value of his cargo, he ungratefully seized twenty of the natives of Gomera, (one of the Canaries) who had affifted him, and with whom he was in friendly alliance, and brought them as slaves to Portugal. But Prince Henry resented this outrage, and having given them some valuable presents of clothes, restored the captives to freedom and their native country.

The conversion and reduction of the Canaries was also this year attempted; but Spain having challenged the discovery of these islands, the expedition was discontinued. In the Canary islands was found a feodal custom; the chief man or governor was gratified with the first night of every bride in his district.

In 1448 Fernando Alonzo was fent ambassador to the King of Cabo Verde with a treaty of trade and conversion, which was defeated at that time by the treachery of the natives. In 1449 the Azores were discovered by Gonsalo Vello, and the coast sixty leagues beyond Cape Verde was visited by the sleets of Henry. It is also certain that some of his commanders passed the equinoctial line. It was the custom of his sailors to leave his motto Talent de Bien Faire, wherever they came; and in 1525 Loaya, a Spanish captain, found that device carved on the bark of a tree in the isle of St. Matthew, in the second degree of south latitude.

Prince Henry had now with the most inflexible perseverance profecuted his discoveries for upwards of forty years. His father, John I. concurred with him in his views, and gave him every affistance; his brother, King Edward, during his short reign, was the same as his father had been; nor was the cleven years regency of his brother Don Pedro less auspicious to him *. But the misunderstanding between Pedro and his nephew Alonzo V. who took upon him the reins of government in his seventeenth year, retarded the designs of Henry, and gave him much unhappiness ‡. At his town of Sagrez, from whence he had not moved for many years, except when called to court on some emergency of state, Don Henry, now in his fixty-seventh year, yielded to the stroke of fate, in the year of our Lord 1463, gratified with the certain prospect, that the route to the eastern world would one day crown the enterprizes to which he had given birth. He had the happiness to see the naval superiority of his country over the Moors established

† Don Pedro was villainously accused of treacherous designs by his bastard brother, the first Duke of Braganza. Henry lest his town of Sagrez to defend his brother at court, but in vain. Pedro, finding the young king in the power of Braganza, fled, and foon after was killed in defending himfelf against a party who were fent to seize him. His innocence, after his death, was fully proved, and his nephew Alonzo V. gave him an honourable burial.

The difficulties he furmounted, and the affiftance he received, are incontestible proofs, that an adventurer of inferior birth could never have carried his defigns into execution.

on the most solid basis, its trade greatly upon the increase, and what he esteemed his greatest happiness, for the piety of his heart was fincere, he flattered himself that he had given a mortal wound to Mohammedism, and had opened the door to an universal propagation of christianity and the civilization of mankind. And to him, as to their primary author, are due all the inestimable advantages which ever have flowed, or ever will flow from the discovery of the greatest part of Africa, of the East and West Indies. Every Improvement in the state and manners of these countries, or whatever country may be yet difcovered, is strictly due to him; nor is the difference between the present state of Europe and the monkish age in which he was born, less the result of his genius and toils. What is an Alexander crowned with trophies at the head of his army compared with a Henry contemplating the ocean from his window on the rock of Sagrez! The one suggests the idea of the evil dæmon, the other of the Deity.

From the year 1448, when Alonzo V. assumed the power of government, till the end of his reign in 1471, little progress was made in maritime affairs, and Cape Catharine was only added to the former discoveries. But under his son John II. the designs of Prince Henry were prosecuted with renewed vigour. In 1481 the Portuguese built a fort on the Golden Coast, and the King of Portugal took the title of Lord of Guinea. Bartholomew Diaz, in 1486, reached the river which he named dell Infante on the eastern side of Africa, but deterred by the storms of that region from proceeding farther, on his return he had the happiness to be the Discoverer of the Promontory, unknown for many ages, which bounds the fouth of Afric. This, from the storms he there encountered, he named the Cape of Tempests; but John, elated with the promise of India, which this discovery, as he justly deemed, included, gave it the name of the Cape of Good Hope. The arts and valour of the Portuguese had now made a great impression on the minds of the Africans. The King of Congo, a dominion of great extent, sent the sons of some of his principal officers to Lisbon to be instructed in arts and religion; and ambassadors from the King of Benin requested teachers to be fent to his kingdom. On the return of his subjects, the King and Queen of Congo, with 100,000 of their their people, were baptized. An ambassador also arrived from the Christian Emperor of Abyssinia, and Pedro de Covillam and Alonzo de Payva were sent by land to penetrate into the East, that they might acquire whatever intelligence might facilitate the desired navigation to India. Covillam and Payva parted at Toro in Arabia and took different routs. The former having visited Conanor, Calicut, and Goa in India, returned to Grand Cairo, where he heard of the death of his companion. Here also he met the Rabbi Abraham of Beja, who was employed for the same purpose by king John. Covillam sent the Rabbi home with an account of what countries he had seen, and he himself proceeded to Ormuz and Ethiopia, but as Camoens expresses it:

Enrich'd with knowledge, be return'd no more.

Men, whose genius led them to maritime affairs, began now to be possessed by an ardent ambition to distinguish themselves; and the famous Columbus offered his service to King John, and was rejected. Every one knows the discoveries of this great adventurer, but his history is generally misunderstood*. It is by some believed, that his ideas of the sphere of the earth

* Greatly misunderstood, even by the ingenious author of the Account of the Eu-ropean Settlements in America. Having ropean Settlements in America. Having mentioned the barbarous state of Europe; "Mathematical learning, fays he, was little valued or cultivated. The true system of the heavens was not dreamed of. There was no knowledge at all of the real form of the earth, and in general the ideas of mankind were not extended beyond their fenfible horizon. In this state of affairs Christopher Columbus, a native of Genoa, undertook to extend the boundaries which ignorance had given to the world. This man's design arose from the just idea he had formed of the figure of the earth"——All a mistake. Henry, who undertook to extend the boundaries which ignorance had given to the world, had extended them much beyond the sensible horizon long ere Columbus appeared. Columbus indeed taught the Spaniards the use of longitude and latitude in navigation, but that great mathematician Henry was the author of that grand discovery, and of the use of the compass. Every alteration here ascribed to. Columbus, had almost fifty years before been effected by Henry. Even Henry's idea of failing to India was adopted by Columbus. It was every where his proposal. When he arrived in the West Indies, he thought he had found the Ophir of Solomon, and thence these islands received their general name, and on his return he told John II. that he had been at the islands of India. To find the spice islands of the East was his proposal at the court of Spain; and even on his fourth and last voyage in 1502, three: years after Gama's return, he promised the king of Spain to find India by a westward passage. But though great discoveries rewarded his toils, his first and last purpose he never compleated. It was referved for Magalhaens to discover the westward route to the Eastern World.

gave birth to his opinion, that there must be an immense unknown continent in the west, such as America is now known to be; and that his proposals were to go in search of it *. But the simple truth is, Columbus, who, as we have certain evidence, acquired his skill in navigation among the Portuguese, could be no stranger to the design long meditated in that kingdom, of discovering a naval route to India, which, according to ancient geographers and the opinion of that age, was supposed to be the next land to the west of Spain. And that India and the adjacent islands were the regions fought by Columbus, is also certain. John, who esteemed the route to India as almost discovered, and in the power of his own subjects, rejected the proposals of the foreigner. But Columbus met a more favourable reception from Ferdinand and Isabella, the king and queen of Castile. To interfere with the route or discoveries, opened and enjoyed by another power, was at this time esteemed contrary to the laws of nations. Columbus, therefore, though the object was one, proposed, as Magalhaens afterwards did for the same reason, to steer the westward course, and having in 1492 discovered some western islands, in 1493, on his return to Spain, he put into the Tagus with great tokens of the riches of his discovery. Some of the Portuguese courtiers, the same ungenerous minds perhaps who advised the rejection of Columbus because he was a foreigner, proposed-the assassination of that great man, thereby to conceal from Spain the advantages of his navigation. But John, though Columbus rather roughly upbraided him, looked upon him now with a generous regret, and difmissed him with honour. The king of Portugal, however, was alarmed, left the discoveries of Columbus, interfered with those of his crown, and gave orders to equip a war fleet to protect his rights. But matters were adjusted by embassies, and that celebrated treaty by which Spain and Portugal divided the Western and Eastern Worlds between themselves. The eastern half of the world was allotted for the Portuguese, and the western for the Spanish navigation. The line of meridian municated the journal of his voyage to Columbus. But this story, as it stands at large, is involved in contradiction without proof, and is every where esteemed a fable of malice.

Gomara and other Spanish writers relate, that while Columbus lived in Madeira, a pilot, the only surviver of a ship's crew, died at his house. This pilot, they say, had been driven to the West Indies or America by tempest, and on his death-bed com-from the north to the fouth pole was their boundary, and thus each nation had one hundred and eighty degrees, within which they might establish settlements and extend their discoveries. And a Papal Bull, which, for obvious reasons, prohibited the propagation of the gospel in these bounds by the subjects of any other state, confirmed this amicable and extraordinary treaty.

Soon after this, while the thoughts of king John were intent on the discovery of India, his preparations were interrupted by his death. But his earnest desires and great designs were inherited, together with his crown, by his cousin Emmanuel. And in 1497, the year before Columbus made the voyage which discovered the mouth of the river Oronoko, Vasco de Gama sailed from the Tagus on the discovery of India.

Of this voyage, the subject of the Lusiad, many particulars are necessarily mentioned in the notes; we shall therefore only allude to these, but be more explicit on the others, which are omitted by Camoens in obedience to the rules of the Epopæa.

Notwithstanding the full torrent of popular clamour against the undertaking, Emmanuel was determined to profecute the views of Prince Henry and John II. Three floops of war and a store ship manned with only 160 men were fitted out; for hostility, was not the purpose of this humane expedition. Vasco de Gama, a gentleman of good family, who, in a war with the French, had given fignal proofs of his naval skill, was commissioned admiral and general, and his brother Paul, for whom he bore the fincerest affection, with his friend Nicholas Coello, were at his request appointed to command under him. It is the greatest honour of kings, to distinguish the characters of their officers, and to employ them accordingly. Emmanuel in many instances was happy in this talent, particularly in the choice of his admiral for the discovery of India. All the enthusiasm of desire to accomplish his end, joined with the greatest heroism, the quickest penetration, and coolest prudence, united to form the character of Gama. On his appointment to the command, he confessed to the king that his mind had long aspired to this expedition. The king expressed great confidence in his prudence and honour, and gave him, with his own hand, the colours which he was to carry. On this banner, which bore the cross of the military order of Christ, Gama, with great enthusiasm to merit the honours bestowed upon him, took the oath of fidelity.

About four miles from Lisbon there is a chapel on the sea side. To this, the day before their departure, Gama conducted the companions of his expedition. He was to encounter an ocean untried, and dreaded as unnavigable, and he knew the force of the ties of religion on minds which are not inclined to dispute its authority. The whole night was spent in the chapel in prayers for success, and in the rites of their devotion. On the next day, when the adventurers marched to the fleet, the shore of Belem * presented one of the most solemn and affecting scenes perhaps recorded in history. The beach was covered with the inhabitants of Lisbon. A numerous procession of priests in their robes sung anthems and offered up invocations to heaven. Every one beheld the adventurers as brave innocent men going to a dreadful execution, as rushing upon certain death; and the vast multitude caught the fire of devotion, and joined aloud in the prayers for success. The relations, friends, and acquaintances of the voyagers wept; all were affected; the figh was general; Gama himself shed some manly tears on parting with his friends, but he hurried over the tender scene, and hastened aboard with all the alacrity of hope. Immediately he gave his fails to the wind, and so much affected were the many thousands who beheld his departure, that they remained unmoveable on the shore till the fleet, under full sail, evanished from their fight.

It was on the 8th of July when Gama left the Tagus. The flag ship was commanded by himself, the second by his brother, the third by Coello, and the store ship by Gonsalo Nunio. Several interpreters, skilled in the Ethiopian, Arabic, and other oriental languages, went along with them. Ten malefactors, men of abilities, whose sentences of death were reversed, on condition of their obedience to Gama in whatever embassies or dangers among the barbarians he might think proper to employ them, were also on board. The sleet, savoured by the weather, passed the Canary and Cape de Verde islands, but had now to encounter other fortune. Sometimes stopped by dead calms, but for the most part tost by tempests, which increased their violence and horrors as they proceeded to the fouth. Thus driven far to sea they laboured through that wide ocean which furrounds St. Helena, in seas, says Faria, unknown to the Portuguese discoverers, none of whom had sailed so far to the west. From the 28th of July, the day they passed the isle of St. James, they had feen no shore, and now on November the 4th they were happily relieved by the fight of land. The fleet anchored in a large * bay, and Coello was fent in fearch of a river where they might take in wood and fresh water. Having found one convenient for their purpose the fleet made toward it, and Gama, whose orders were to acquaint himself with the manners of the people wherever he touched, ordered a party of his men to bring him some of the natives by force or stratagem. One they caught as he was gathering honey on the fide of a mountain, and brought him to the fleet. He expressed the greatest indifference of the gold and fine clothes which they shewed him, but was greatly delighted with some glasses and little brass bells. These with great joy he accepted, and was set on shore; and foon after many of the blacks came for, and were gratified with the like trifles; and for which in return they gave great plenty of their best provisions. None of Gama's interpreters, however, could understand a word of their language or receive any information of India. And the friendly intercourse between the flect and the natives was foon interrupted by the imprudence of Veloso, a young Portuguese, which occasioned a scuffle, wherein Gama's life was endangered. Gama and some others were on shore taking the altitude of the sun, when in consequence of Veloso's rashness they were attacked by the blacks with great fury. Gama defended himself with an oar, and received a dart in his foot. Several others were likewise wounded, and they found their safety in retreat. The shot from the ships facilitated their escape, and Gama esteeming it imprudent to waste his strength in attempts entirely foreign to the design of his voyage, weighed anchor, and steered in search of the extremity of Afric.

^{*} Or Bethlehem, fo named from the chapel.

In this part of the voyage, says Osorius, in illo autem cursu valdé Gamæ virtus enituit—The heroism of Gama was greatly displayed. The waves swelled like mountains in height, the ships feemed now heaved up to the clouds, and now appeared as precipitated by gulphy whirlpools to the bed of the ocean. The winds were piercing cold, and so boisterous that the pilot's voice could feldom be heard, and a dismal, almost continual darkness, which at that tempestuous season involves these seas, added all its horrors. Sometimes the storm drove them southward, at other times they were obliged to stand on the tack and yield to its sury, preserving what they had gained with the greatest difficulty.

With fuch mad feas the daring Gama fought
For many a day, and many a dreadful night,
Incessant labouring round the stormy Cape,
By bold ambition led—— Thomson.

During any gloomy interval of the storm, the sailors, wearied out with satigue, and abandoned to despair, surrounded Gama, and implored him not to suffer himself, and those committed to his care, to perish by so dreadful a death. The impossibility that men so weakened should stand it much longer, and the opinion that this ocean was torn by eternal tempests, and therefore had hitherto been, and was unpassable, were urged. But Gama's resolution to proceed was unalterable*. A formidable conspiracy was then formed against his

* The voyage of Gama has been called merely a coasting one, and therefore much less dangerous and heroical than that of Columbus, or of Magalhaens. But this, it is prefumed, is one of the opinions hastily taken up, and founded on ignorance. Columbus and Magalhaens undertook to navigate unknown oceans, and fo did Gama; with this difference, that the ocean around the Cape of Good Hope, which Gama was to encounter, was believed to be, and had been avoided by Diaz, as unpassable. Prince Henry suggested that the current of Cape Bajador might be avoided by standing to sea, and thus that Cape was first passed. Gama for this reason did not coast, but stood to sea for upwards of three months of tempestuous weather. The tempests which afflicted Columbus and Magalhaens are by their different historians described with circumstances of less horror and danger than those which attacked Gama. All the three commanders were endangered by mutiny; but none of their crews, fave Gama's, could urge the opinion of ages, and the example of a living captain, that the dreadful ocean which they attempted was impassable. Columbus and Magalhaens always found means, after detecting a conspiracy, to keep the rest in hope; but Gama's men, when he put the pilots in irons, continued in the utmost despair. Columbus was indeed ill obeyed; Magalhaens fometimes little better; but nothing, fave the wonderful authority of Gama's command, could have led his crew through the tempest which he surmounted ere he doubled the Cape of Good Hope. Columbus, with his crew, must have returned. The expedients with which he used to soothe them, would, under bis authority, have had no avail in the tempest which Gama rode through.

life. But his brother discovered it, and the courage and prudence of Gama defeated its design. He put the chief conspirators and all the pilots in irons, and he himself, his brother, Coello, and some others, stood night and day to the helms and directed the course. At last, after having many days, with unconquered mind, withstood the tempest and an enraged mutiny (molem persidiae) the storm suddenly ceased, and they beheld the Cape of Good Hope.

On November the 20th all the fleet doubled that promontory, and steering northward, coasted along a rich and beautiful shore, adorned with large forests and numberless herds of cattle. All was now alacrity; the hope that they had surmounted every danger revived their spirits, and the admiral was beloved and admired. Here, and at the bay, which they named St. Blas, they took in provisions, and beheld these beautiful rural scenes, described by Camoens. And here the store sloop, now of no farther service, was burnt by order of the admiral. On December the 8th a violent tempest drove the fleet from the sight of land, and carried them to that dreadful current which made the Moors deem it impossible to double the Cape. Gama, however, though unlucky in the time of navigating these seas, was safely carried over the current by the violence through. From every circumstance it is evident that Gama had determined not to return, unless he found India. Nothing less than such resolution to perish or attain his point could have led him on. But Columbus, ill obeyed indeed, returned from the mouth of the river Oronoko, before he had made a certain discovery whether the land was isle or continent. When Gama met a strong current off Ethiopia he bore on, though driven from his course. Columbus steering fouthward in search of continent met great currents. He imagined they were the riling of the sea towards the canopy of heaven, which for ought he knew, say the Universal Historians, they might touch towards the fouth. He therefore turned his course, and steered to . the west. The passing of the straits of Magellan, however hazardous, was not attended with fuch danger as Gama experienced at the Cape. The attempt to cross the Pacific was greatly daring, but his voyage in that sea was happy. The navigation of the straits of Magelian and the Pacific are in this country little known; but the course of Gama is at this day infinitely more hazardous than that of Columbus. If Columbus found no pilots to conduct him, but encountered bis greatest dangers in sounding his courfe among the numerous western islands, Gama, though in the Indian ocean affisted by pilots, had as great trials of his valour, and much greater ones of his prudence. The force and the deep treacherous arts of the Moors, were not found in the west. All was simplicity among the natives there. The prudence and foresight of Gama and Columbus were of the highest rate; Magalhaens was in these sometimes rather inferior. He lost his own, and the lives of the greatest part of his crew, by hazarding a land engagement at the advice of a judicial astrologer. See the note, p.

of a tempest; and having recovered the fight of land, as his fafest course, he steered northward along the coast. On the 10th of January they descried, about 230 miles from their last watering place, some beautiful islands, with herds of cattle frisking in the meadows. It was a profound calm, and Gama stood near to land. The natives were better dreffed and more civilized than those they had hitherto seen. An exchange of prefents was made, and the black king was so pleased with the politeness of Gama, that he came aboard his ship to see him. At this place, which he named Terra de Natal, Gama left two of the malefactors, to procure what information they could against his return. On the 15th of January, in the dusk of the evening, they came to the mouth of a large river, whose banks were shaded with trees loaded with fruit. On the return of day they faw several little boats with palm-tree leaves making towards them, and the natives came aboard without hesitation or fear. Gama received them kindly, gave them an entertainment, and some silken garments, which they received with visible joy. Only one of them however could speak a little broken Arabic. From him Fernan Martinho learned, that not far distant was a country where ships, in shape and size like Gama's, frequently reforted. This gave the fleet great spirits, and the admiral named this place The River of Good Signs.

Here, while Gama careened and refitted his ships, the crews were attacked with a violent scurvy, which carried off several of his men. Having taken in fresh provisions, on the 24th of February he set sail, and on the first of March they descried four islands on the coast of Mozambic. From one of these they perceived seven vessels in full sail bearing to the sleet. These knew Gama's ship by the admiral's ensign, and made up to her, saluting her with loud huzzas and their instruments of music. Gama received them aboard, and entertained them with great kindness. The interpreters talked with them in Arabic. The island, in which was the principal harbour and trading town, they faid, was governed by a deputy of the king of Quiloa; and many Saracen merchants, they added, were fettled here, who traded with Arabia, India, and other parts of the world. Gama was overjoyed, and the crew with uplifted hands returned thanks to heaven profite and the target days

Cope. The attempt to casts the

Pleased with the presents which Gama sent him, and imagining that the Portuguese were Mohammedans from Morocco, Zacocia the governor, dressed in rich embroidery, came to congratulate the admiral on his arrival in the East. As he approached the fleet in great pomp, Gama removed the fick out of fight, and ordered all those in health to attend above deck, armed in the Portuguese manner; for he foresaw what would happen when the Mohammedans should discover it was a Christian fleet. During the entertainment provided for him, Zacocia seemed highly pleased, and asked several questions about the arms and religion of the strangers. Gama shewed him his arms, and explained the force of his cannon, but he did not affect to know much about religion; however he frankly promised to shew him his books of devotion whenever a few days refreshment would give him a more convenient time. In the meanwhile he intreated Zacocia to fend him some pilots who might conduct him to India. Two pilots were next day brought by the governor, a treaty of peace was solemnly concluded, and every office of mutual friendship seemed to promise a lasting harmony. But it was soon interrupted. Zacocia, as foon as he found the Portuguese were Christians, used every endeavour to destroy the fleet. The life of Gama was attempted. One of the Moorish pilots deserted, and some of the Portuguese, who were on shore to get fresh water, were attacked by seven barks of the natives, but were rescued by a timely affistance from the ships.

Besides the hatred of the Christian name, inspired by their religion, the Mohammedan Arabs had other reasons to wish the destruction of Gama. Before this period, these Arabs were almost the only merchants of the East; they had colonies in every place convenient for trade, and were the sole masters of the Ethiopian, Arabian, and Indian seas. They clearly fore-saw the consequences of the arrival of Europeans, and every art was soon exerted to prevent such formidable rivals from effecting any sooting in the East. To these Mohammedan traders, the Portuguese, on account of their religion, gave the name of Moors.

Immediately after the skirmish at the watering-place, Gama, having one Moorish pilot, set sail, but was soon driven back to the same island by tempestuous weather. He now resolved to take take in fresh water by sorce. The Moors perceived his intention, about two thousand of whom rising from ambush, attacked the Portuguese detachment. But the prudence of Gama had not been asseep. His ships were stationed with art, and his artillery not only dispersed the hostile Moors, but reduced their town, which was built of wood, into a heap of asses. Among some prisoners taken by Paulus de Gama was a pilot, and Zacocia begging forgiveness for his treachery, sent another, whose skill in navigation he greatly commended.

A war with the Moors was now begun. Gama perceived that their jealousy of European rivals gave him nothing to expect but open hostility and secret treachery; and he knew what numerous colonies they had on every trading coast of the East. To impress them therefore with the terror of his arms on their first act of treachery, was worthy of a great commander. Nor was he remiss in his attention to the chief pilot, who had been last sent. He perceived in him a kind of anxious endeavour to bear near some little islands, and suspecting there were unseen rocks in that course, he confidently charged the pilot with guilt, and ordered him to be severely whipped. The punishment produced a confession and promises of fidelity. And he now advised Gama to stand for Quiloa, which he assured him was inhabited by Christians. Three Ethiopian Christians had come aboard the fleet while at Zacocia's island, and the current opinions of Prester John's country inclined Gama to try if he could find a port, where he might expect the affistance of a people of his own religion. A violent storm however drove the fleet from Quiloa, and being now near Mombaze, the pilot advised him to enter that harbour, where, he said, there were also many Christians.

The city of Mombaza is agreeably situated on an island, formed by a river which empties itself into the sea by two mouths. The buildings are lofty and of firm stone, and the country abounds with fruit trees and cattle. Gama, happy to find a harbour where every thing wore the appearance of civilization, ordered the sleet to cast anchor, which was scarcely done, when a galley, in which were 100 men in Turkish habit, armed with bucklers and sabres, rowed up to the slag ship. All of these seemed desirous to come aboard, but only four, who by their dress seemed officers, were admitted; nor were these allowed, till stript of their arms. As soon as onboard, they extolled the prudence of Gama in refusing admittance to armed strangers; and by their behaviour, seemed defirous to gain the good opinion of the fleet. Their country, they boasted, contained all the riches of India, and their king, they professed, was ambitious of entering into a friendly treaty with the Portuguese, with whose renown he was well acquainted. And that a conference with his majesty and the offices of friendship might be rendered more convenient, Gama was requested and advised to enter the harbour. As no place could be more commodious for the recovery of the fick, and the whole fleet was fickly, Gama resolved to enter the port; and in the meanwhile fent two of the pardoned criminals as an embassy to the king. These the king treated with the greatest kindness, ordered his officers to shew them the strength and opulence of his city; and on their return to the navy, he fent a present to Gama of the most valuable spices, of which he boasted such abundance, that the Portuguese, he said, if they regarded their own interest, would seek for no other India.

STI

To make treaties of commerce was the business of Gama; one fo advantageous, and fo defired by the natives, was therefore not to be refused. Fully satisfied by the report of his spies, he ordered to weigh anchor and enter the harbour. His own ship led the way, when a sudden violence of the tide, made Gama apprehensive of running aground. He therefore ordered the fails to be furled and the anchors to be dropt, and gave a fignal for the rest of the fleet to follow his example. This mainœuvre, and the cries of the failors in executing it, alarmed the Mozambic pilots. Conscious of their treachery, they thought their design was discovered, and leapt into the sea. Some boats of Mombaza took them up, and refusing to put them on board, fet them fafely on shore, though the admiral repeatedly demanded the restoration of the pilots. These circumstances, evident proofs of treachery, were farther confirmed by the behaviour of the king of Mombaza. In the middle of the night Gama thought he heard fome noise, and on examination, found his fleet surrounded by a great number of Moors, who, in the utmost privacy, endeavoured to cut his cables. But their scheme was defeated; and some Arabs, who remained on board, confessed that no Christians were resident either at

Quiloa

The

Quiloa or Mombaza. The storm which drove them from the one place, and their late escape at the other, were now beheld as manifestations of the Divine favour, and Gama, holding up his hands to heaven, ascribed his safety to the care of Provividence *. Two days, however, elapsed, before they could get clear of the rocky bay of Mombaze, and having now ventured to hoist their sails, they steered for Melinda, a port, they had been told, where many merchants from India reforted. In their way thither they took a Moorish vessel, out of which Gama selected fourteen prisoners, one of whom he perceived by his mein to be a person of distinction. By this Saracen, Gama was informed, that he was near Melinda, that the king was hospitable, and celebrated for his faith, and that four ships from India, commanded by Christian masters, were in that harbour. The Saracen also offered to go as Gama's messenger to the king, and promised to procure him an able pilot to conduct him to Calicut, the chief port of India.

As the coast of Melinda appeared to be dangerous, Gama. anchored at some distance from the city, and unwilling to hazard any of his men, he landed the Saracen on an island opposite to Melinda. This was observed, and the stranger was brought before the king, to whom he gave so favourable an account of the politeness and humanity of Gama, that a prefent of several sheep, and fruits of all forts, was fent by his majesty to the admiral, who had the happiness to find the truth of what his prisoner had told him, confirmed by the masters of the four ships from India. These were Christians from Cambaya. They were transported with joy on the arrival of the Portuguese, and gave several useful instructions to the admiral.

The city of Melinda was fituated in a fertile plain, furrounded with gardens and groves of orange-trees, whose flowers diffused a most grateful odour. The pastures were covered with herds, and the houses built of square stones, were both elegant and magnificent. Defirous to make an alliance with fuch a state, Gama requited the civility of the king with great generosity. He drew nearer the shore, and urged his instructions as apology for not landing to wait upon his majesty in person! who in the a soul onwa

It afterwards appeared, that the Moorish king of Mombaza had been informed of what happened at Mozambic, and intended to revenge it by the total destruction of the Reet.

The apology was accepted, and the king, whose age and infirmity prevented himself, sent his son to congratulate Gama, and enter into a treaty of friendship. The prince, who had sometime governed under the direction of his father, came in great pomp. His dress was royally magnificent, the nobles who attended him displayed all the riches of filk and embroidery, and the music of Melinda resounded all over the bay. Gama, to express his regard, met him in the admiral's barge. The prince, as foon as he came up, leapt into it, and distinguishing the admiral by his habit, embraced him with all the intimacy of old friendship. In their conversation, which was long and sprightly, he discovered nothing of the barbarian, says Osorius, but in every thing shewed an intelligence and politeness worthy of his high rank. He accepted the fourteen Moors, whom Gama gave to him, with great pleasure. He seemed to view Gama with enthusiasm, and confessed that the make of the Portuguese ships, so much superior to what he had seen, convinced him of the greatness of that people. He gave Gama an able pilot, named Melemo Cana, to conduct him to Calicut; and requested, that on his return to Europe, he would carry an ambassador with him to the Court of Lisbon. During the few days the fleet stayed at Melinda, the mutual friendship increased, and a treaty of alliance was concluded. And now, on April 22, resigning the helm to his skillful and honest pilot, Gama hoisted sail and steered to the north. In a few days they passed. the line, and the Portuguese with extacy beheld the appearance of their native sky. Orion, Ursa major and minor, and the other stars about the northern pole, were now a more joyful discovery than the south I pole had formerly been to them.

to mark them out. — All this is truly curious, and affords a good comment on the temper of the man who had the art to defraud Columbus, by giving his own name to America; of which he challenged the discovery. Near fifty years before the voyage of Amerigo Vespucci, the Portuguese had crossed the line; and Diaz fourteen, and Gama near three years before, had doubled the Cape of Good Hope, had discovered seven stars in the constellation of the south pole, and from the appearance of the four most luminous, had given it the name of The Cross, a figure which it better resembles than that of an almond.

[†] A circumstance in the letters of Amerigo Vespucci deserves remark. Describing his voyage to America. Having past the line, says he, "e come desideres d'essere Autore che segnassi la stella—desirous to be the namer and discoverer of the pole star of the other hemisphere, I lost my sleep many nights in contemplating the stars of the other pole." He then laments, that as his instruments could not discover any star of less motion than ten degrees, he had not the statistaction to give a name to any one. But as he observed sour stars, in sorm of an almond, which had but little motion, he hoped in his next voyage he should be able

The pilot now stood to the east, through the Indian ocean, and after sailing about three weeks, he had the happiness to congratulate Gama on the view of the mountains of Calicut. Gama, transported with extacy, returned thanks to heaven, and ordered all his prisoners to be set at liberty, that every heart might taste of the joy of his successful voyage.

About two leagues from Calicut Gama ordered the fleet to anchor, and was foon surrounded by a number of boats. By one of these he sent one of the pardoned criminals to the city. The appearance of an unknown fleet on their coast brought immense crowds around the stranger, who no sooner entered Calicut, than he was lifted from his feet and carried hither and thither by the concourfe. Though the populace and the stranger were alike earnest to be understood, their language was unintelligible to each other, till, happy for Gama in the event, a Moorish merchant accosted his messenger in the Spanish tongue. The next day this Moor, who was named Monzaida, waited upon Gama on board his ship. He was a native of Tunis, and the chief person, he said, with whom John II. had at that port contracted for military stores. He was a man of abilities and great intelligence of the world, and an admirer of the Portuguese valour and honour. The engaging behaviour of Gama heightened his esteem into the sincerest attachment. He offered to be interpreter for the admiral, and to serve him in whatever besides he might possibly befriend him. And thus, by one of those unforeseen circumstances, which often decide the greatest events, Gama received a friend, who soon rendered him the most critical and important service.

At the first interview, Monzaida gave Gama the fullest information of the clime, extent, customs, religions, and various riches of India, the commerce of the Moors, and the character of the sovereign. Calicut was not only the imperial city, but the greatest port. The king or Zamorim, who resided here, was acknowledged as emperor by the neighbouring princes; and as his revenue consisted chiefly of duties on merchandise, he had always encouraged the resort of foreigners to his harbours.

Pleased with this promising prospect, Gama sent two of hissofficers with Monzaida to wait upon the Zamorim at his palace of Pandarene, a sew miles from the city. They were admitted to the royal apartment, and delivered their embassy; to which the Zamorim replied, that the arrival of the admiral of so great a prince as Emmanuel, gave him inexpressible pleasure, and that he would willingly embrace the offered alliance. In the meanwhile, as their present station was extreamly dangerous, he advised them to bring the ships nearer to Pandarene, and for this purpose he sent a pilot to the fleet.

A few days after this, the Zamorim sent his first minister, or Catual, attended by several of the Nayres, or nobility, to conduct Gama to the royal palace. As an interview with the Zamorim was absolutely necessary to compleat the purpose of his voyage, Gama immediately agreed to it, though the treachery he had already experienced since his arrival in the eastern seas, shewed him the personal danger which he thus hazarded. He gave his brother Paulus and Coello the command of the fleet in his absence; and in the orders he left them, displayed a heroism superior to that of Alexander, when he crossed the Granicus. That of the Macedonian was ferocious and frantic, the offspring of vicious ambition; that of Gama was the child of the strongest reason, begotten upon the most valorous mental dignity: It was the high pride of honour, a pride, of which the man, who in the fury of battle can rush on to the mouth of a cannon, may be utterly incapable.

The revenue of the Zamorim arose chiefly from the traffic of the Moors; the various colonies of these people were combined in one interest, and the jealousy and consternation which his arrival in the eastern seas had spread among them, were circumstances well known to Gama: And he knew also what he had to expect, both from their force and their fraud. But duty and honour required him to compleat the purpose of his voyage. He left peremptory command, that if he was detained a prisoner, or any attempt made upon his life, they should take no step to save him, or to reverse his fate; to give ear to no mesfage which might come in his name for fuch purpose, and to enter into no negociation on his behalf. Though they were to keep some boats near the shore, to favour his escape if he perceived treachery ere detained by force; yet the moment that force rendered his escape impracticable, they were to set sail, and carry the tidings to the king. For as this was his only concern, he would suffer no risk that might lose a man, or endanger danger the homeward voyage. Having left these unalterable orders, he went ashore with the Catual, attended only by twelve of his own men, for he would not weaken his fleet, though he knew the pomp of attendance would in one respect have been greatly in his favour at the first court of India.

As foon as landed, he and the Catual were carried in great pomp, in sofas, upon mens shoulders, to the chief temple, and from thence, amid immense crouds, to the royal palace. The apartment and drefs of the Zamorim were such as might be expected from the luxury and wealth of India. The emperor lay reclined on a magnificent couch, furrounded with his nobility and officers of state. Gama was introduced to him by a venerable old man, the chief Bramin. His majesty, by a gentle nod, appointed the Admiral to fit on one of the steps of his fofa, and then demanded his embassy. It was against the custom of his country, Gama replied, to deliver his instructions in a public assembly, he therefore desired that the king and a few of his ministers would grant him a private audience. This was complied with, and Gama, in a manly speech, set forth the greatness of his sovereign Emmanual, the same he had heard of the Zamorim, and the desire he had to enter into an alliance with so great a prince; nor were the mutual advantages of such a treaty omitted by the Admiral. The Zamorim, in reply, professed great esteem for the friendship of the king of Portugal, and declared his readiness to enter into a friendly alliance. He then ordered the Catual to provide proper apartments for Gama in his own house; and having promised another conference, he dismissed the Admiral with all the appearance of sincerity.

The character of this monarch is strongly marked in the history of Portuguese Asia. Avarice was his ruling passion; he was haughty or mean, bold or timorous, as his interest rose or fell in the ballance of his judgment; wavering and irrefolute whenever the scales seemed doubtful which to preponderate. He was pleased with the prospect of bringing the commerce of Europe to his harbours, but he was also influenced by the threats of the Moors.

Three days elapsed ere Gama was again permitted to see the Zamorim. At this second audience he presented the letter and presents of Emmanuel. The letter was received with politeness, but the presents were viewed with an eye of contempt. Gama beheld it, and faid he only came to discover the route to India, and therefore was not charged with valuable gifts, ere the friendship of the state, where they might chuse to traffic, was known. Yet that indeed he brought the most valuable of all gifts, the offer of the friendship of his sovereign, and the commerce of his country. He then entreated the king not to reveal the contents of Emmanuel's letter to the Moors, and the king with great feeming friendship desired Gama to guard against the perfidy of that people. And at this time, it is highly probable, the Zamorim was sincere.

Every hour fince the arrival of the fleet, the Moors had held fecret conferences. That one man of it might not return was their purpose; and every method to accomplish this was meditated. To influence the king against the Portuguese, to assassinate Gama, to raise a general insurrection to destroy the foreign navy, and to bribe the Catual, were determined. And the Catual, the mafter of the house where Gama was lodged, accepted the bribe, and entered into their interest. Of all these circumstances, however, Gama was apprifed by his faithful interpreter Monzaida, whose affection to the foreign Admiral the Moors hitherto had not suspected. Thus informed, and having obtained the faith of an alliance from the sovereign of the first port of India, Gama resolved to elude the plots of the Moors; and accordingly, before the dawn, he set out for Pandarene, in hope to get aboard his fleet by some of the boats which he had ordered to hover about the shore.

But the Moors were vigilant. His escape was immediately known, and the Catual, by the king's order, purfued and brought him back by force. The Catual, however, for it was necessary for their schemes to have the ships in their power, behaved with politeness to the Admiral, and promised to use all his interest in his behalf.

The eagerness of the Moors now contributed to the safety of Gama. Their principal merchants were admitted to a formal audience, when one of their orators accused the Portuguese as a nation of faithless plunderers: Gama, he said, was an exiled pirate, who had marked his course with blood and depredation. If he were not a pirate, still there was no excuse for giving such warlike foreigners any footing in a country already supplied with all that nature and commerce could give. He expatiated on the great services which the Moorish traders had rendered to Calicut, or wherever they settled; and ended with a threat, that all the Moors would leave the Zamorim's ports, and find some other settlement, if he permitted these foreigners any share in the commerce of his dominions.

However staggered with these arguments and threats, the Zamorim was not blind to the self-interest and malice of the Moors. He therefore ordered, that the Admiral should once more be brought before him. In the meanwhile the Catual tried many stratagems to get the fleet into the harbour; and at last, in the name of his master, made an absolute demand that the fails and rudders should be delivered up, as the pledge of Gama's honesty. But these demands were as absolutely refused by Gama, who fent a letter to his brother by Monzaida, enforcing his former orders in the strongest manner, declaring that his fate gave him no concern, that he was only unhappy lest the fruits of all their fatigue and dangers should be lost. After two days spent in vain altercation with the Catual, Gama was brought as a prisoner before the king. The king repeated his accusation, upbraided him with non-compliance to the requests of his minister, yet urged him, if he were an exile or pirate, to confess freely, in which case he promised to take him into his service, and highly promote him on account of his abilities. But Gama, who with great spirit had baffled all the stratagems of the Catual, behaved with the same undaunted bravery before the king. He afferted his innocence, pointed out the malice of the Moors, and the improbability of his piracy; boasted of the fafety of his fleet, offered his life rather than his fails and rudders, and concluded with threats in the name of his fovereign. The Zamorim, during the whole conference, eyed Gama with the keenest attention, and clearly perceived in his unfaultering mein the dignity of truth, and the consciousness that he was the Admiral of a great monarch. In their late address, the Moors had treated the Zamorim as somewhat dependant upon them, and he faw that a commerce with other nations would certainly lessen their dangerous importance. His avarice strongly defired the commerce of Portugal; and his pride was flattered in humbling the Moors. After many proposals, it was at last agreed, that of his twelve attendants he should leave seven as hostages, that what goods were aboard his fleet should be landed, and that Gama should be safely conducted to his ship, after which the treaty of commerce and alliance was to be finally settled. And thus, when the assassination of Gama seemed inevitable, the Zamorim suddenly dropt the demand of the sails and the rudders, rescued him from his determined enemies, and restored him to liberty and the command of his navv.

As foon as he was aboard * the goods were landed, accompanied by a letter from Gama to the Zamorim, wherein he boldly complained of the treachery of the Catual. The Zamorim, in answer, promised to make enquiry, and to punish him if guilty, but did nothing in the affair. Gama, who had now anchored nearer to the city, every day sent two or three different persons on some business to Calicut, that as many of his menas possible might be able to give some account of India. The Moors, in the meanwhile, every day affaulted the ears of the king, who now began to waver; when Gama, who had given every proof of his desire of peace and friendship, sent another letter, in which he requested the Zamorim to permit him to leave a conful at Calicut to manage the affairs of king Emmanuel. But to this request, the most reasonable result of a commercial treaty, the Zamorim returned a refusal full of rage and indignation. Gama, now fully master of the character of the Zamorim, resolved to treat a man of such an inconstant dishonourable disposition with a contemptuous silence. This contempt was felt by the king, who yielding to the advice of the Catual and the entreaties of the Moors, seized the Portuguese goods, and ordered two of the seven hostages, the two who had the charge of the cargo, to be put in irons. The Admiral remonstrated by the means of Monzaida, but the king still perfisted in his treacherous breach of royal faith. Repeated folicitations made him more haughty, and it was now the duty and interest of Gama to use force. He took a vessel, in which were fix Nayres or noblemen, and nineteen of their fervants. The servants he set ashore to relate the tidings, the noblemen he detained. As foon as the news had time to spread through the city, he hoisted his fails, and, though with a slow motion, feemed to proceed on his homeward voyage. The city was now in an uproar; the friends of the captive noblemen furrounded the palace, and loudly accused the policy of the Moors. The king, in all the perplexed distress of a haughty, avaritious, weak prince, fent after Gama, delivered up all the hostages, and submitted to his proposals; nay, even solicitated that an agent should be left, and even descended to the meanness of a palpable lie. The two factors, he faid, he had put in irons, only to detain them till he might write letters to his brother Emmanuel, and the goods he had kept on shore that an agent might be fent to dispose of them. Gama, however, perceived a mysterious trifling, and, previous to any treaty, insisted upon the restoration of the goods.

The day after this altercation Monzaida came aboard the fleet in great perturbation. The Moors, he faid, had raifed great commotions, and had enraged the king against the Portuguese. The king's ships were getting ready, and a numerous Moorish fleet from Mecca was daily expected. To delay Gama till this force arrived, was the purpose of the court and of the Moors, who were now confident of success. To this information Monzaida added, that the Moors, suspecting his attachment to Gama, had determined to affassinate him. That he had narrowly escaped from them; that it was impossible for him to recover his effects, and that his only hope was in the protection of Gama. Gama rewarded him with the friendship he merited. took him with him, as he defired, to Lisbon, and procured him a recompence for his fervices.

Almost immediately after Monzaida, seven boats arrived, loaded with the goods, and demanded the restoration of the captive noblemen. Gama took the goods on board, but refused to examine if they were entire, and also resused to deliver the prisoners. He had been promised an ambassador to his sovereign, he said, but had been so often deluded, he could trust fuch a faithless people no longer, and would therefore carry the captives in his power to convince the king of Portugal what infults and injustice his ambassador and admiral had suffered from the Zamorim of Calicut. Having thus dismissed the Indians, he fired his cannon and hoisted his fails. A calm, however, detained him on the coast some days, and the Zamorim seizing the opportunity, sent what vessels he could fit out, twenty of a larger fize, fixty in all, full of armed men, to attack him. Though Gama's cannon were well played, confident of their numbers, they pressed on to board him, when a sudden tempest, which Gama's ships rode out in safety, miserably dispersed the Indian sleet, and compleated their ruin.

After this victory the Admiral made a halt at a little island near the shore, where he erected a cross*, bearing the name and arms of his Portuguese majesty. And from this place, by the hand of Monzaida, he wrote a letter to the Zamorim, wherein he gave a full and circumstantial account of all the plots of the Catual and the Moors. Still, however, he professed his desire of a commercial treaty, and promised to represent the Zamorim in the best light to Emmanuel. The prisoners, he said, should be kindly used, were only kept as ambassadors to his sovereign, and should be returned to India when they were enabled from experience to give an account of Portugal. The letter he sent by one of the captives, who by this means obtained his liberty.

The fame of Gama had now spread over the Indian seas, and the Moors were every where intent on his destruction. As he was near the shore of Anchediva, he beheld the appearance of a floating isle, covered with trees, advance towards him. But his prudence was not to be thus deceived. A bold pirate, named Timoja, by linking together eight vessels full of men and covered with green boughs, thought to board him by furprize. But Gama's cannon made seven of them fly; the eighth, loaded with fruits and provision, he took. The beautiful island of Anchediva now offered a convenient place to careen his ships and refresh his men. While he staid here, the first minister of Zabajo king of Goa, one of the most powerful princes of India, came on board, and in the name of his master, congratulated the Admiral in the Italian tongue. Provisions, arms and money were offered to Gama, and he was entreated to accept the friendship of Zabajo. The Admiral was struck with admiration, the address and abilities of the minister appeared so conspicuous. He said he was an Italian by birth, but in sailing to Greece, had been taken by pirates, and after various misfor-

^{*} It was the custom of the first discoverers to erect crosses on places remarkable in their voyage. Gama erected six; one, dedicated to St. Raphael, at the river of Good Signs, one to St. George, at Mozambic, one to St. Stephen, at Melinda, one to St. Gabriel, at Calicut, and one to St. Mary, at the island thence named, near Anchediva.

tunes, had been necessitated to enter into the service of a Mohammedan prince, the nobleness of whose disposition he commended in the highest terms. Yet, with all his abilities, Gama perceived an artful inquisitiveness, that nameless something which does not accompany simple honesty. After a long conference, Gama abruptly upbraided him as a spy, and ordered him to be put to the torture—And this soon brought a confession, that he was a Polonian Jew by birth, and was sent to examine the strength of the sleet by Zabajo, who was mustering all his power to attack the Portuguese. Gama on this immediately set sail, and took the spy along with him, who soon after was baptized, and named Jasper de Gama, the Admiral being his godfather. Afterwards he became of great service to Emmanuel.

Gama now stood westward through the Indian ocean, and after being long delayed by calms, arrived off Magadoxa, on the coast of Africa. This place was a principal port of the Moors; he therefore levelled the walls of the city with his cannon, and burned and destroyed all the ships in the harbour. Soon after this he descried eight Moorish vessels bearing down upon him; his artillery, however, soon made them use their oars in flight, nor could Gama overtake any of them for want of wind. The hospitable harbour of Melinda was the next place he reached. His men, almost worn out with fatigue and sickness, here received, a fecond time, every affistance which an accomplished and generous prince could bestow. And having taken an ambassdor on board, he again set sail, in hope that he might pass the Cape of Good Hope while the favourable weather continued, for his acquaintance with the eastern seas now suggested to him, that the tempestuous season was periodical. Soon after he set sail his brother's ship struck on a sand bank, and was burnt by order of the admiral. His brother and part of the crew he took into his own ship, the rest he sent on board of Coello; nor were more hands now alive than were necessary to man the two veffels which remained. Having taken in provisions at the island of Zanzibar, where they were kindly entertained by a Mohammedan prince of the same sect with the king of Melinda, they fafely doubled the Cape of Good Hope on April 26, 1499, and continued till they reached the island of St. Iago in favourable weather. But a tempest here separated the two ships, and gave Gama and Coello an opportunity to shew shew the goodness of their hearts, in a manner which does honour to human nature.

The Admiral was now near the Azores, when Paulus de Gama, long worn with fatigue and sickness, was unable to endure the motion of the ship. Vasco, therefore, put into the island of Tercera, in hope of his brother's recovery. And such was his affection, that rather than leave him, he gave the command of his ship to one of his officers. But the hope of recovery was vain. John de Sa proceeded to Lisbon with the flag ship, while the admiral remained behind to soothe the death bed of his brother, and perform his funeral rites. Coello, in the mean while, landed at Lisbon, and hearing that Gama was not arrived, imagined he might either be shipwrecked or beating about in distress. Without seeing one of his family, he immediately fet sail, on purpose to bring relief to his friend and Admiral. But this generous design, more the effect of friendship than just consideration, was prevented by an order from the king, ere he got out of the Tagus.

The particulars of the voyage were now diffused by Coello, and the joy of the king was only equalled by the admiration of the people. Yet while all the nation was fired with zeal to express their esteem of the happy Admiral, he himself, the man who was such an enthusiast to the success of his voyage, that he would willingly have sacrificed his life in India to secure that success, was now in the completion of it a dejected mourner. The compliments of the court and the shouts of the street were irksome to him, for his brother, the companion of his toils and dangers, was not there to share the joy. As soon as he had waited on the king, he shut himself up in a lonely house near the sea side at Bethlehem, from whence it was sometime ere he was drawn to mingle in public life.

During this important expedition, two years and almost two months elapsed. Of 160 men who went out, only 55 returned. These were all rewarded by the king. Coello was pensioned with 100 ducats a year and made a sidalgo, or gentleman of the king's houshold, a degree of nobility in Portugal. The title of Don was annexed to the family of Vasco de Gama; he was appointed admiral of the eastern seas, with an annual salary of 3000 ducats, and a part of the king's arms was added to his. Public thanksgivings to heaven were celebrated throughout throughout the churches of the kingdom, and feasts, interludes, and chivalrous entertainments, the taste of that age, demonstrated the joy of Portugal.

As the prophetic Song in the tenth Lusiad requires a commentary, we shall now proceed to a compendious history of the negociations and wars of the Portuguese in India; a history, though very little known, of the utmost importance to every commercial state, particularly to that nation which now commands the trade of the East.

The power, interest, and disposition of the Moors, the masters of the eastern seas, pointed out to Emmanuel what course he ought to follow, if he intended to reap either honour or advantage from the discovery of India. The accumulated treachery of the Moors had kindled a war; force was now necessary; a sleet therefore of thirteen sail and 1500 men was sitted out for India, and the command of it given to an experienced officer, Pedro Alvarez de Cabral.

The chief instructions of Cabral, were to enter into a treaty of friendship with the Zamorim, and to obtain leave to build a fort and factory near Calicut. But if he found that prince still persidious and averse to an alliance, he was to proceed to hostilities on the first instance of treachery.

Cabral, in this voyage, was driven to America by a tempest, and was the first who discovered the Brazils. As he doubled the south of Africa, he encountered a most dreadful storm; the heavens were covered with pitchy darkness for many days, and the waves and winds vied with each other in noise and sury. Four ships, with all their crews, perished; among whom was the celebrated Bartholomew Diaz, the discoverer of the Cape of Good Hope, which, as if prophetic of his sate, he had named the Cape of Tempests.

When Cabral reached the coast of Zofala, he had only six ships. Here he engaged two Moorish vessels, laden mostly with gold dust, and took them. But finding they were commanded by, and belonged to Foteyma, an uncle of the king of Melinda, he not only restored the prizes, but treated the Xeque with the greatest courtesy. At Mozambique he agreed with a pilot to conduct him to Quiloa. The king of this place and the admiral had a pompous interview. An alliance was solemnly concluded. But Homeris, brother to the king of Melinda, was at Quiloa; and by him Cabral was informed of a treacherous preparation to attack him. As his destination was for Calicut, he delayed revenge, and proceeded to Melinda. Here he landed the Melindian ambassador, who had been sent to Portugal; and here his generous treatment of the Xeque Foteyma strengthened the friendship and good offices which had begun with Gama.

When he arrived at Calicut, whether he was conducted by two Melindian pilots, he fent Ayres Correa on shore to settle the manner how the Zamorim and the admiral were to meet. Six principal Bramins, whose names were brought from Portugal by the advice of Monzaida, were given as hostages for the safety of the admiral; and the Indian noblemen, who had been carried away by Gama, were returned. After much delay with the wavering Zamorim, a commercial alliance, by which the Portuguese vessels were to receive their lading before those of any other nation, was solemnly confirmed by oath, and a house was appointed as a factory for the Portuguese; of which Correa, with seventy men under his command, took immediate possession.

The history of an infant settlement is like that of infant Rome; if the smallest circumstances are not attended to, the fecret springs of action escape us, and we are sure to be led into error. Cabral's fleet was to be laded with spicery; but the Moorish merchants, still intent on the ruin of their rivals the Portuguese, did every thing in their power to retard it, in hope of another rupture. While promifes to Cabral trifled away the time, the Zamorim desired his assistance to take a large ship belonging to the king of Cochin, who not only intended to invade his dominions, but also had refused to sell him an elephant which was now aboard that ship. There were two Moorish agents with whom Cabral was obliged to transact business. To Coje Bequi he paid the greatest respect, for he found him most worthy of it; but Cemireci, the other, pretending great friendship to Cabral, advised him by all means to gratify the Zamorim by taking the ship of Cochin. This vessel was large and full of foldiers, but Cabral appointed one of his fmallest, commanded by Pedro Ataide, not a fixth part of her fize, to attack her. When Ataide first made towards the enemy, the Indian infulted him with every fign of reproach; but the Portuguese cannon drove her into the port of Cananor, a place whither forty miles to the north of Calicut. Here she lay all the night, while Ataide watched the mouth of the harbour; and fearing to be burnt in the port, in the morning she again took to sea. But Ataide soon came up with her, and by the dexterous use of his artillery, made her steer what course he pleased, and at last drove her in triumph before him into the harbour of Calicut.

This affair was of great consequence to the Portuguese. It not only raised a high idea of their valour and art of war, but it discovered a scene of treachery, and gave them a most beneficial opportunity to display their integrity and honour. When Cabral conversed with the captives, he found that the story of the elephant and the invasion were false, and that they had been warned by Cemireci, that the Portuguese, a set of lawless pirates, intended to attack them. On this, Cabral not only restored the ship to the king of Cochin, but paid for what damage she had sustained, and assured him he had been abused by the villainy of the Moors.

The Zamorim professed the greatest admiration of the Portuguese valour, yet while he pretended to value their friendship at the highest rate, he used every art to delay the lading of their ships. Twenty days was the time stipulated for this purpose, but three months were now elapfed, and nothing done. Cabral several time complained to the Zamorim of the infringement of treaty, that many Moorish vessels had been suffered to lade, while he could obtain no cargo. The Zamorim complained of the arts of the Moors, and gave Cabral an order, on paying for the goods, to unlade whatever Moorish vessels he pleased, and to supply his own. Cabral, however, was apprehensive of some deep design, and delayed to put this order in execution: urged by Correa, who feverely upbraided him with neglect of duty, he at last seized a vessel which happened to belong to one of the richest of the Moors. A tumult was immediately raised, the Portuguese factory was suddenly beset by four thoufand of that people, and before any affistance could come from the ships, Correa, and the greatest part of his companions, were massacred. Cabral, though greatly enraged, waited sufficient time to hear the excuse of the Zamorim, but waited in vain. Ten large Moorish vessels burnt in the harbour, the city of Calicut bombarded one day, and 600 of its inhabitants flain, revenged the death of Correa.

The king of Cochin, when Cabral returned the ship which he had taken, highly pleased with his honour, invited him to traffic in his port. Cabral now sailed thither, and was treated in the most friendly manner. A strong house was appointed for a factory, and a treaty of commerce solemnly concluded. Ambassadors also arrived from the kings of Cananor, Caulan, and other places, intreating the alliance of the Portuguese, whom they invited to their harbours.

About eight hundred years before this period, according to tradition *, Perimal, the fovereign of India, having embraced the religion of Mohammed, in which he had been instructed by some Arabian merchants, resolved to end his days as a hermit at Mecca. He therefore divided his empire into different fovereignties, but rendered them all tributary to the Zamorim of Calicut. From this port Perimal fet fail, and the Arab merchants conceived such a superstitious affection for this harbour, though not so commodious as many others around, that on the arrival of Gama it was the great centre of the Moorish commerce in India. The tributary kings; fays the author of Histoire Philosophique, &c. desirous to throw off their dependence on the Zamorim, invited the Portuguese to their harbours. He ought to have added, that it was impossible they should have acted so, unless they had conceived a high idea of the Portuguese virtue and valour, which was thus rewarded by the friendship of some powerful princes, who ever after remained true to the Portuguese.

When Cabral was about to fail from Cochin, he received information from the king, that the Zamorim, with a large fleet, containing 15,000 foldiers, intended to attack him. Cabral prepared for battle, and the Indian fleet fled. He afterwards touched at Cananor, where he entered into a friendly alliance with the king, who suspecting from the small quantity of spicery which he bought that the Admiral was in want of money, intreated him to give a mark of his friendship by accepting of what he pleased. But Cabral shewed a considerable quantity of gold to the king's messengers, politely thanked him, and said he was already suspected ambassadors on board, he proceeded on his homeward voyage. Near Melinda he took a large ship, but sinding she belonged to a merchant of Cananor, he set her at liberty, and told the commander, " that the Portuguese monarch was only at war with the Zamorim and the Moors of Mecca, from whom he had rec eived the greatest injuries and indignities." The king of Melinda, and other Mohammedan princes, who had entered into alliances with Gama and Cabral, were not of the tribe or confederacy of those who had in different parts attempted the ruin of the Portuguese. That people were now distinguished by the name of the Moors of Mecca: and to diffress this port became now a principal object of the Portuguese.

Emmanuel, now fully informed by Cabral of the states and traffic of the Indian feas, perceiving that the reinforcement of three vessels, which he had sent under John de Nova*, could little avail, fitted out twenty ships, the command of which warlike fleet was given to the celebrated Vasco de Gama. At the same time the Pope issued a Bull, in which he styled Emmanuel, Lord of the Navigation, Conquests and Trade, of Æthiopia, Arabia, Persia, and India.

Gama, having doubled the Cape of Good Hope, touched at Sofala, and made a treaty with the Mohammedan fovereign of that rich country. Mozambic was now governed by a new monarch, who entreated an alliance with the Portuguese, which was granted; and the isle where Gama had the battle with the Moors ‡, became, for long after, a most convenient wateringplace for the Portuguese navies. In revenge of the plots against himself, and the injuries received by Cabral, he battered the city of Quiloa with his cannon, and made the king submit to pay tribute to Emmanuel. As he proceeded for Calicut, he met a large ship of Mecca, which, with many people of distinction who were going on a pilgrimage to the tomb of their prophet, had lately left that harbour. This vessel, after an obstinate struggle, in which 300 Moors were + killed, he took and burnt. And from some vessels of Calicut, as he approached that port, he took about thirty prisoners. As soon as he anchored near the city, the Zamorim sent a message to offer terms of friend-

[•] This officer defeated a large fleet of the Zamorim, but could not be supposed to effect. any thing of permanency. On his return to Europe, Nova discovered the isle of St. Helena.

[†] Twenty children were faved. These were sent to Lisbon, where they were baptized and educated in the service of Emmanuel. Their happy sate, boasted of by the Portuguese writers, shews us the character of these times.

thip, to excuse the massacre of the Portuguese under Correa, as the sole action of an enraged populace, with which government had no concern; and added, that the sate of the ship of Mecca he hoped would suffice for revenge. Gama, previous to any new treaty, demanded a restitution of the goods of which the Portuguese sactory had been plundered, and threatened to put his prisoners to death and batter the city in case of resusal. After waiting some time in vain for an answer, Gama ordered his thirty prisoners to be hanged and their bodies to be sent ashore, together with a letter, declaring war against the Zamorim, in the name of the king of Portugal. And next day, having for several hours played his cannon upon the city, he steered his course for the more friendly port of Cochin.

Here the factors who had been left by Cabral gave Gama the highest character of the faith of the king, and his earnest desire to cultivate the friendship of the Portuguese; and the former alliance was mutually confirmed by the king and the admiral. The Zamorim, who with rage and regret beheld the commerce of Europe carried to other harbours, sent a Bramin to Gama, while he was lading at Cochin, intreating an oblivion of past injuries, and a renewal of the league of amity. The Admiral, still desirous to cultivate friendship, gave the command of the fleet to his cousin Stephen de Gama, and with two ships only sailed for Calicut; yet, lest treachery should be intended, he ordered Vincent Sodre with five ships to follow him. On his arrival at the city, he found that diffimulation was still the character of the Zamorim. Four and thirty vessels, full of armed men, attacked Gama's ship with great fury, for the other vessel he had sent to hasten the squadron of Sodre. In this situation nothing but a brisk wind could possibly save Gama, and a brisk gale in this extremity rose and carried him beyond the reach of the fleet of Calicut. But having met the reinforcement of Sodre, the Admiral immediately returned, and totally destroyed the fleet of the enemy.

Disappointed in war, the Zamorim now by intreaties and threats endeavoured to bring the king of Cochin into his interest. But that prince, with the greatest honour, refused to betray the Portuguese; and Gama having promised to leave a squadron to protect his harbour, sailed with thirteen loaded ships for the port of Cananor. On his way thither, as he past within

within a few miles of Calicut, he was again vigorously attacked by twenty-nine vessels, fitted out by the Zamorim, on purpose to intercept him. Gama ordered three ships, which had the least loading, to begin the engagement, and victory soon declared in his favour. He then proceeded to Cananor, where he entered into a treaty with the sovereign, who bound himself never to make war on the king of Cochin, or to assist the Zamorim. And Gama, having left six ships under the command of Sodre, for the protection of Cochin and Cananor, sailed for Portugal, where, after a prosperous voyage, he arrived with twelve ships, loaded with the riches of the East.

As foon as Gama's departure was known, the Zamorim made great preparations to attack Cochin. It was the purpose of Emmanuel, that Sodre should be left with a squadron to cruise about the mouth of the Red Sea, and annoy the Moors of Mecca; but Gama, whose power was discretionary, ordered him not to leave Cochin, unless every thing bore the appearance of peace with the Zamorim. Sodre, however, though hostility was every day expected, prepared to depart. Diego Correa, the Portuguese agent left at Cochin, in the strongest manner urged him to do his duty and continue at that port, but in vain. While the king of Cochin resolutely refused, though advised by many of his council, to deliver up the Portuguese residents to the Zamorim, Sodre, contrary to the orders of Gama, sailed for the Red Sea, in hope of the rich prizes of Mecca; and thus basely deserted his countrymen, and a prince, whose faith to the Portuguese had involved him in a war which threatened destruction to his kingdom.

The city of Cochin is situated on an island, divided from the continent by an arm of the sea, one part of which, at low water, is fordable. At this pass the Zamorim began the war, and met some defeats. At last, by the force of numbers and the power of bribery, he took the city, and the king of Cochin sled to the island of Viopia. Yet, though stript of his dominions, he retained his faith to the Portuguese. He took them with him to this place, where a few men could defend themselves; and though the Zamorim offered to restore him to his throne if he would deliver them up, he replied, "that his enemy might strip him of his dominions and his life, but it was not in his power to deprive him of his fidelity."

While-

While Trimumpara, king of Cochin, was thus shut up on a little rock, Sodre suffered a punishment worthy of his perfidy. His ship was beaten to pieces by a tempest, and he and his brother lost their lives. The other commanders considered this as the judgment of heaven, and hastened back to the relief of Cochin: by stress of weather, however, they were obliged to put into one of the Anchidivian islands. Here they were joined by Francis Albuquerk, who, on hearing the fate of Cochin, though in the rigour of winter, set fail for its relief. When the fleet appeared in fight of Viopia, Trimumpara exclaiming Portugal, Portugal, ran in an extacy to the Portuguese; and they in return, with shouts of triumph, announced the restoration of his crown. The garrison left in Cochin by the Zamorim immediately fled. Trimumpara was restored to his throne without a battle, and Albuquerk gave an instance of his masterly policy. Together with the thanks of Emmanuel, he made the king of Cochin a present of 10,000 ducats. An act which wonderfully excited the admiration of the princes of India, and was a severe wound to the Zamorim.

Francis and Alonzo Albuquerk and Duarte Pacheco were now at Cochin. The princes, tributary to Trimumpara, who had deserted to the Zamorim, were severely punished by the troops of Cochin, headed by the Portuguese, and their depredations were carried into the Zamorim's own dominions. A treaty of peace was at last concluded, on terms greatly advantageous to the Portuguese commerce. But that honour which had been of the greatest benefit to their affairs, was now stained. A ship of Calicut was unjustly seized by the Portuguese agent at Cochin; nor would Francis Albuquerk make restitution, though required by the Zamorim. Soon after this, Francis sailed for Europe, but gave another instance of his infamy ere he left India. The Zamorim had again declared war against the king of Cochin, and Francis Albuquerk left only one ship, three barges, and about one hundred and fifty men, for the defence of Trimumpara; but this small body was commanded by Pacheco. Francis Albuquerk, and Nicholas Coello, celebrated in the Lusiad, sailed for Europe, but were heard of no more.

Anthony Saldanna and Roderic Ravasco were at this time sent from Lisbon to cruise about the mouth of the Red Sea.

Theking of Melinda was engaged in a dangerous war with theking of Mombassa, and Saldanna procured him an honourable peace. But Ravasco acted as a lawless pirate on the coast of Zanzibar. Though the innocent inhabitants were in a treaty of peace with Gama, he took many of their ships, for which he extorted large ransoms, and compelled the prince of Zanzibar to pay an annual tribute and own himself the vassal of Emmanuel. The Pope's Bull, which gave all the East to the king of Portugal, began now to operate. The Portuguese esteemed it as a sacred charter, the natives of the East felt the consequence of it, and conceived a fecret jealoufy and dislike of their new masters. The exalted policy and honour of many of the Portuguese governors delayed the evil operation of this jealoufy, but the remedy was only temporary. The Portuguese believed they had a right to demand the vassallage of the princes of the East, and to prohibit them the navigation of their own seas. When the usurpation of dominion proceeds from a fixed principle, the wisdom of the ablest Governor can only skin over the mortal wound; for the groffest barbarians are most acutely sensible of injustice, and carefully remember the breaches of honour.

The Zamorim had now collected a formidable power for the destruction of Cochin. But before we mention the wonderful victories of Pacheco, it will be necessary to give some account of the land and maritime forces of the East. And here it is to be lamented, that the Portuguese authors have given us but very imperfect accounts of the military arts of India. Yet it is to be gathered from them, that though fire arms were not unknown, they were very little used before the arrival of the Portuguese. Two natives of Milan, who were brought to India by Gama on his second voyage, deserted to the Zamorim, and were of great fervice to him in making of powder and casting of cannon. The Perfians despised the use of fire arms, as unmanly, and the use of artillery on board of a fleet, is several times mentioned, as peculiar to the Moors of Mecca. The vessels of the Zamorim were large barges rowed with oars, and crouded with men, who fought with darts and other missile weapons. We are told by Osorius, that the pilot of Melinda, who conducted Gama to Calicut, despised the Astrolabe, as if used to superior instruments. We doubt, however, of his superior knowledge, for we know that he coasted northward to a particular limit, and then then stood directly for the rising sun. We are also told by the Jesuits of the perfection of the Chinese navigation, and that they have had the use of the compass for 3000 years; but this is also doubtful. For there is not a name in any eastern language for that instrument; nor do they know how to make one, or to arm the loadstone. They purchase them of Europeans, and the Italian word Bussola is the name of the compass among the natives of the East.

While the Zamorim was preparing his formidable armament against Cochin, the security which appeared on the mein of Pacheco, prompted Trimumpara to suspect some fraud: and he intreated that captain to confess what he intended. Pacheco felt all the refentment of honour, and affured him of victory. He called a meeting of the principal inhabitants, and uttered the severest threats against any person who should dare to desert to the Zamorim, or to leave the island. Soon after, two fishermen were brought before him, who had been following their employment beyond the limits he had prescribed. Pacheco ordered them to be hanged in prison. The king pleaded for their lives, but Pacheco in public was inexorable. In the night, however, he fent the two fishermen to the king's palace, where he desired they might be concealed with the greatest secrecy; and the severity of their fate was publickly believed. Every precaution, by which the passage to the island of Cochin might be secured, was taken by Pacheco. The Portuguese took the sacrament, and devoted themselves to death. The king of Cochin's troops amounted only to 5000; the fleet and army of the Zamorim consisted of 57,000 men. Yet this great army, though provided with brass cannon, and otherwise assisted by the two Milanese engineers, was deseated by Pacheco. Seven times the Zamorim raised new armies, some of them more numerous than the first, but all of them were defeated at the fords of Cochin, by the stratagems and intrepidity of Pacheco. Though the Zamorim in the latter battles exposed his own person to the greatest danger, and was sometimes sprinkled with the blood of his attendants; though he had recourse to poison and every art of fraud, all his attempts, open and private, were baffled. At last, in despair of revenge, he resigned his crown, and shut himself up for the remainder of his days in one of his idol temples. Soon after the kingdom of Cochin was thus restored to prosperity, Pacheco was recalled to Europe. The king of Portugal paid the highest compliments to his valour; and as he had acquired no fortune in India, in reward of his services he gave him a lucrative government in Africa. But merit always has enemies. Pacheco was accused, and by the king's order brought to Lisbon in irons; and those hands which preserved the interest of Portugal in India, were in Portugal chained in a dungeon a considerable time, ere a legal trial determined the justice of this severity. He was at last tried, and honourably acquitted; but his merit was thought of no more, and he died in an alms-house. Merit thus repaid, is a severe wound to an empire. The generous ardour of military spirit cannot receive a colder check, than such examples are sure to give it.

Before the departure of Pacheco, a fleet of thirteen ships, commanded by Lopez Soarez, arrived in India. The new Zamorim beheld with regret the ruined condition of his kingdom. his tributary princes not only now independent, but possessed of the commerce which formerly enriched Calicut; the fatal consequence of his uncle and predecessor's obstinacy. Taught by these examples, he desired a peace with the Portuguese; but Soarez would hear nothing till the two Milanese deserters were delivered up. This perfidy to men who had been promifed protection, the Zamorim generously refused. And Soarez, regardless of the fate of some Portuguese who had been left at Calicut by Cabral, battered the city two days, in place of granting an honourable and commercial peace. Nor was this his only impolitical error. By shewing such eagerness to secure the Milanese engineers, he told the Zamorim the value of these European artists. And that prince soon after applied to the Soldan of Egypt, who sent him four Venetians, able engineers, and masters of the art of the foundery of cannon.

In the stately spirit of conquest Soarez traversed the Indian seas, destroyed many Calicutian and Moorish vessels, and made various princes pay tribute and confess themselves the vassals of Emmanuel. But the Soldan of Egypt began now to threaten hostilities, and a stronger force of the Portuguese was necessary. Francisco d'Almeyda, an officer of distinguished merit, was therefore appointed Viceroy of India, and was sent with two and twenty ships to affert his jurisdiction. And according to the uncommercial ideas of Gothic conquest with which he set out, he proceeded. On his arrival at Quiloa, a meeting between him and the king was appointed. Almeyda attended, but the king did not, for a black cat, as he fet out, happened to cross his way, and intimidated by this evil omen, he declined the interview. On this, Almeyda levelled his city with the ground, and appointed another king, tributary to Emmanuel. Some late treacheries of Mombassa were also revenged by the destruction of that city and the vassalage of its monarch. When the Viceroy arrived in India, he defeated the king of Onor, built forts and left garrisons in various places. Trimumpara, king of Cochin, had now retired to spend the evening of his life in a Brahmin temple, and his nephew, who with great pomp was crowned by Almeyda, acknowledged himself the tributary of the king of Portugal.

The Soldan of Egypt was at this time one of the greatest princes of the world. The lucrative commerce of the East had long flowed to the West through his dominions. His fleets and his armies were thus rendered numerous and powerful, and bound by their political religion, in a war with the Christians, every Mohammedan prince was his ally. A heavy revenge of the Crusades was in meditation, and Europe miserably divided in itself, invited its own ruin; when, says an author*, accurate in historical facts, the liberties of mankind were faved by the voyage of Vasco de Gama: The sinews of the Egyptian and Turkish strength were cut asunder by the destruction of their commerce with the eastern world.

Enraged with the interruption which his trade had already received, the Soldan resolved to prevent its utter ruin. He threatened the extirpation of all the Christians ‡ in his dominions, if the court of Rome would not order the king of Portugal to withdraw his fleets for ever from the eastern seas. One Maurus, a monk, was his ambassador to Rome and Lisbon, but in place of compliance, he returned with the severer threats of Emmanuel. War was now determined, and a most formidable fleet, fixty vessels of which were larger than the Portuguese, manned with Turks experienced in war, were sent to the affistance of the Zamorim. But by the superior naval skill and romantic bravery of Almeyda and his fon Lorenzo, this mighty armament was defeated.

[·] See Histoire Philosophique & Politique des Etablissemens & du Commerce des Européens dans les deux Indes. I See the note, p. 432.

At this time Tristan de Cugna and the celebrated Alphonso Albuquerk arrived in the East, and carried war and victory from Sofala to India. Allured by the honour and truly commercial treaties of Gama and Cabral, several princes of India invited these strangers to their harbours. But the alteration of the behaviour and claims of the Portuguese, had altered the sentiments of the natives. Almost every port now opposed the entrance of the Portuguese, and the cargo of almost every shipthey loaded was purchased with blood. At the sack of the city of Lamo, some of the soldiers under Cugna cut off the hands and ears of the women to get their bracelets and earrings with more expedition. But though these villains, by overloading their boat with their plunder, were all drowned, this stain on the Portuguese character made war against the Portuguese name and interest. When Albuquerk arrived before Ormuz, he summoned the king to become the vasfal of Emmanuel, and to be happy under the protection of so great a prince. The king of Ormuz, who expected fuch a visit, had provided an army of 33,000 men, 6000 of which were expert archers, auxiliaries of Persia. Yet these were defeated by 460 disciplined men, well played cannon, and the dauntless valour of Albuquerk. And the king of Ormuz submitted to vafsalage. Lords of the seas also, the Portuguese permitted no ship to fail without a Portuguese passport. Nor was this regarded, when avarice prompted that the passport was forged. A rich ship of Cananor was on this pretence taken and plundered, and the unhappy crew, to conceal the villany, were fewed up in the fail cloths and drowned. Vaz, it is true, the commander of this horrid deed, was broken. But the bodies of the Moors were thrown on shore, and the king of Cananor, the valuable ally of Portugal, in revenge of this treachery, joined the Zamorim, and declared war against the Portuguese. Another powerful armament, commanded by Mir Hocem, a chief of great valour, was fent by the Soldan. Persia also asfisted. And even the mountains of Dalmatia*, by the conni-

[•] The timber was brought through the Mediterranean to Cairo, and from thence was carried by camels to the port of Suez.

vance of Venice, were robbed of their forests, to build navies in Arabia against the Portuguese.

Almeyda sent his brave son Lorenzo to give battle to Mir Hocem, but Lorenzo fell the victim of his romantic bravery. While the father prepared to revenge the death of his fon, his recall, and the appointment of Albuquerk to succeed him, arrived from Europe; but Almeyda refused to resign till he had revenged his son's defeat. On this, a dispute between the two governors arose, of fatal consequence to the Portuguese interest in Asia. Albuquerk was imprisoned, and future governors often urged this example on both sides of the question, both to protract the continuance, and press the instant surrender of office. Almeyda, having defeated the Zamorim and his Egyptian allies, failed for Europe*, crowned with military laurels. But though thus plumed in the vulgar eye, his establishments were contrary to the spirit of commerce. He fought, indeed, and conquered; but he left more enemies of the Portuguese in the East than he found there. The honours he attained were like his, who having extinguished a few fires in a city, marches out in triumph, but leaves glowing embers in every house, ready to burst forth in a general flame. It was left for the great Albuquerk to establish the Portuguese empire in Asia on a surer basis, on acts of mutual benefit to the foreign colonists and native princes.

Albuquerk, whose power was somewhat limitted by that of Coutinho, now turned his thoughts to the solid establishment of the Portuguese empire. To extinguish the power of Calicut, and to erect a fortished capital for the seat of government, were his designs; and in these he was greatly assisted, both by the arms and the counsel of Timoja the pirate, who, greatly injured by the Indian princes, was glad to enter into alliance with the Portuguese. With thirty vessels and 2400 men, Albuquerk and Fernando Coutinho sailed from Cochin to besiege Calicut. It was agreed, that the troops under Coutinho, should have the honour to land first. Those under Albuquerk, however, galled by the enemy, leapt first ashore. Coutinho, on this, roughly upbraided him: To conquer the feeble Indians, he said, was no such honour as some boasted. And I will tell the king of Portugal, he added, that

I entered the palace of the Zamorim with only my cane in my hand. Albuquerk remonstrated the danger of rashness in vain. Coutinho ordered Jasper de Gama, the Polonian Jew, to conduct him to the palace; to which, with 800 men, he marched in confused speed. Albuquerk, whose magnanimity could revenge no infult when his country's interest was at stake in the hour of battle, followed in good order with 600 men, and left others properly stationed, to secure a retreat, for he foresaw destruction. Coutinho, after several attacks, at last, with the loss of many men, entered the palace, and gave his soldiers liberty to plunder. All was now diforder among them. And Albuquerk, who perceived it, entreated Coutinho, by message, to beware of a fiercer attack. He was answered, he might take care of the troops under his own command. After two hours spent in plundering the palace, Coutinho set fire to it and marched out. But ere he could join Albuquerk, both parties were furrounded by enraged multitudes. Coutinho and his bravest officers fell; Albuquerk was wounded by arrows in the neck and left arm. At last, struck on the breast by a large stone, he dropped down, to appearance dead. On his shield he was carried off with great difficulty. All was confusion in the retreat, till the body of reserve, placed by Albuquerk, came up, and repulfed the enemy. Albuquerk was carried on board without hope of recovery. His health, however, was restored at Cochin, and the Zamorim allowed a fort to be built near Calicut, and submitted to the terms of peace proposed by the Portuguele governor.

The island of Goa, on the coast of Decan, a most commodious situation for the seat of empire, and whose prince had been treacherous to Gama, after various desperate engagements, was at last yielded to Albuquerk. According to his design, he fortissed it in the best manner, and rendered it of the utmost consequence to the preservation of the Portuguese power. He now turned his thoughts to Malaca, the great mart of the eastern half of the oriental world. Under the government of Almeyda, Sequeira had sailed thither, and while about settling a treaty with the natives, narrowly escaped a treacherous massacre, in which several of his men were slain. Albuquerk offered peace and commerce, but demanded atonement for this injury. His terms were rejected, and this important place, won by most astonishing astonishing victories, was now added to the Portuguese dominion. Here, as at Goa, the governor coined money; regulated the courts of justice, and by his generous behaviour, won the affection and esteem of the people whom he had conquered. He received from, and sent ambassadors to the king of Siam and other princes; to whom he offered the trade of Malaca on more advantageous conditions than it had hitherto been. And an immense commerce from China and all the adjacent regions foon filled that harbour. For here, as at Ormuz and Goa, the reduction which he made in the customs, gave an increase of trade which almost doubled the revenue of the king of Portugal. At every place where he made a fettlement, Albuquerk promoted the marriage of his foldiers with the natives, and thus secured the means of mutual defence: a piece of the best policy, though seldom adopted by other nations *. When the governor returned to Goa, he was received, fays Faria, as a father by his family. The island was at this time besieged by 20,000 of Hydal Can, the lord of Decan's troops, yet victory declared for Albuquerk. But to display the terror of the Portuguese arms was only the second motive of this great man. To convince the Indian princes of the value of his friendship was his first care, and treaties of commerce were with mutual fatisfaction concluded with the king of Bisnagar, the king of Narfinga, and other powerful princes. The city of Aden, near the mouth of the Red Sea, was of great importance to the fleets of the Soldan. Albuquerk twice attacked this place, but could not carry it for want of military stores. By the vessels, however, which he kept on these coasts, he gave a severe wound to the Egyptian and Moorish commerce; and by the establishments which he made in India, entirely ruined it. Mahomet, the expelled tyrant of Malaca, affisted by 20,000 Javans, attempted to recover his throne; but the wish of the people was fulfilled, and Albuquerk was again victorious. The Persians, to whom Ormuz had been tributary, endeavoured to bring it again under their yoke 1; but Albuquerk haftened from Malaca and totally t When the Persians sent a demand of tribute, Albuquerk said it should be paid; and a large silver bason, under cover, was presented to the ambassador. When uncovered, leaden bullets and points of spears appeared: There, said Albuquerk, is the tribute which the kings of Portugal pay.

^{*} The offspring of the Portuguese marriages at this day people many of the coasts of India and Africa; and were Portugal what Great Britain now is, might be of the utmost service to her commercial interest.

defeated

defeated them, to the great joy of the inhabitants. Here he fell fick, and being advifed by his phyficians to go to India for the recovery of his health, the king of Ormuz, who called him his father, parted from him with tears. On his way to India he received intelligence, that a fleet, arrived from Portugal, had brought his recall, that Lopez Soarez was appointed to succeed him, and that Iago Mendez was come to be governor of Cochin. When he heard this, he exclaimed, " Are these whom I sent prisoners to Portugal for heinous crimes, are these returned to be governors! Old man, Oh, for thy grave! Thou hast incurred the king's displeasure for the sake of the subjects, and the subjects for the fake of the king! Old man, fly to thy grave, and retain that honour thou has ever preserved!" A prosound melancholy now feized him; but finding the certain approaches of death, he recovered his chearfulness, and with great fervor gave thanks to God, that a new governor was ready to succeed him. On the bar of Goa, in the fixty-third year of his age, he breathed his last*, after a regency of little more than five years. Yet, in this short space, he not only opened all the eastern world to the commerce of Portugal, but by the regulations of his humane and exalted policy, by the strict distribution of justice which he established, secured its power on a basis, which nothing but the discontinuance of his measures could subvert. Under Albuquerk the proud boast of the historian Faria was justified. The trophies of our victories, says he, are not bruised belmets and warlike engines bung on the trees of the mountains; but cities, islands, and kingdoms, first humbled under our feet, and then joyfully worshiping our government. The princes of India, who viewed Albuquerk as their father, clothed themselves in mourning on his death, for they had experienced the happiness edly read to him; and he expired with the greatest composure. Long after his death his bones were brought to Portugal; but it was with great difficulty, and after long delays, ere the inhabitants of Goa would confent to part with his remains. Goa was populous, its inhabitants chiefly Moors and Indians. These, when injured by the Portuguese, would come and weep at the tomb of Albuquerk, utter their complaints to his manes, and call on his God to revenge their wrongs.

^{*} A little before he died he wrote this manly letter to the king of Portugal, "Under the pangs of death, in the difficult breathing of the last hour, I write this my last letter to your Highness; the last of many I have awritten to you full of life, for I was then employed in your service. I have a son, Blas de Albuquerk; I entreat your Highness to make him as great as my service deserves. The affairs of India will answer for themselves, and for me." Osorius says, the latter part of the Gospel of John, was, at his desire, repeat-and protection which his friendship gave them. And the fincerity of their grief shewed Emmanuel what a subject he had lost. The affairs of the Portuguese in India were now in the happiest condition; but there was a disease at the court of Lisbon, which exerted its fatal malignity, that disease of all governments, particularly the despotic, the false accusation of the absent, by those who are present at the fountain of power.

Accustomed to the affable manners of Albuquerk, the referved haughty dignity assumed by Soarez, gave the Indian allies of Portugal the first proof that the mourning which they wore for his predecessor was not in vain. Now, fay the Portuguese authors, commenced the period when the foldier no more followed the dictates of honour, when those who had been captains turned traders, and procured the loading of their ships in the military way, as if upon the forage in an enemy's country. After having performed the parade of a new governor in vifiting the forts, and in breaking and raifing officers, Soarez prepared, according to his orders, to reduce the coasts of the Red Sea to the obedience of Portugal. Another great Egyptian fleet, commanded by a Turk, named Raez Solyman, had failed from Suez, and Soarez, with twenty-seven ships, set sail in fearch of it. When he came before Aden, he found that strong city defenceless. Solyman, by order of the Soldan, with whom the governor had quarrelled, had levelled a part of the wall. The governor, thus at his mercy, artfully offered the keys to Soarez, and entreated his friendship. Secure of the Moor's honesty, Soarez delayed to take possession, till he had given battle to the Soldan's fleet. This he found in the port of Gidda or Jodda, defended by the cannon of the walls. He therefore did not attempt it; and after burning a few defenceless towns, he returned to Aden. But the breaches were now repaired, and his own force, which had suffered greatly by tempestuous weather in the Red Sea, was, he deemed, unable to take that city, which now refused to surrender. While Soarez was employed in this inglorious expedition, Goa was reduced to the greatest danger. A quarrel about a Portuguese deserter had kindled a war, and Hydal Can, with an army of 30,000 men, laid seige to that important fortress. But the arrival of three Portuguese ships raised the seige, at a time when famine had almost brought the garrison to despair. Nor was Malaca happier than Goa. The uncurbed tyranny of the Portuguese had almost driven trade from that harbour, and the dethroned king once more invaded the island with a great army. But Alexis de Menezes, appointed governor of that place, arrived, in the most critical time, with 300 men, and faved Malaca. The trade with China after this greatly increased, and the king of Ceylon, with whom Albuquerk had established a valuable commerce, was compelled by Soarez to pay tribute to the king of Portugal. A furveyor of the king's revenue about this time arrived in India, vested with a power, which interfered with, and lessened that of the governor. Hence complaints and appeals were by every fleet carried to Europe, and by every fleet that returned the removal of officers was brought. Integrity now afforded no protection, and to amass wealth with the utmost expedition, was now the best way to secure its possession. Rapacity prevailed among the Portuguese, and all was discontent among the natives, when in 1518, after a regency of about three years, Soarez was recalled, and in power and title of governor succeeded by Iago Lopez de Sequeyra. Albuquerk was dreadful to his enemies in war, and to his foldiers on the least appearance of disobedience. But at other times, his engaging manners won the hearts of all. And his knowledge of human nature, which formed his political conduct, was of the first rate. Soarez, on the contrary, the man who refused an. equitable treaty offered by the Zamorim, and was for such errors of incapacity sent prisoner to Lisbon by Albuquerk, displayed in all his transactions the meanest abilities. All his capacity seemed to reach no farther than to preserve that solemn face of dignity, that haughty reserved importance with which the dull transact the most trisling affairs; a solemnity of which heavy intellects are extremely jealous and careful, which the ignorant revere, and which the intelligent despise. When the court of Lisbon sent a Soarez to supercede an Albuquerk, they gave a prophecy of the fall of their empire.

Sequeyra, the discover of Malaca, began his regency with the relief of that important mart; and the king of Bintam, the besieger, after several attempts, was compelled to submit to a treaty distated by the Portuguese. Forty-eight ships, under the command of the governor, sailed to reduce the strong fort and harbour of Diu or Dio, on the coast of Cambaya, an object of great importance to the Portuguese, but nothing was attempted. Continual Skirmishes, however, dyed every shore with blood, while no method of cultivating the friendship of the hostile natives was thought of. Every thing on the contrary tended to inflame them. John de Borba, shipwrecked on the coast of Achem, was generously relieved by the sovereign. George de Brito arrived soon after, and Borba informed him, that in the fepulchres of the kings were immense treasures of gold; and that the present king, his benefactor, had formerly robbed some Portuguese vessels. Brito, at the head of 200 men, immediately began hostilities, but was defeated and killed, and the kings of Achem became the inveterate enemies of the Portuguese, and often gave them infinite trouble. The Maluco islands were now discovered. The kings of these at strife with each other, were each earnest for the alliance of the Portuguese. But they, led by their usual ideas, soon involved themselves in war and flaughter. Ormuz, where Albuquerk was beloved as a father, was now unable to bear the Portuguese yoke. The tribute was raised, and the king complained that his revenues could not afford to pay it. Sequeyra on this fent Portuguese officers to impose and collect the king's customs. This impolitical step was followed by its natural consequence. The insolence and oppression of the officers produced a revolt. Sequeyra, however, defeated the people of Ormuz, and almost doubled the tribute which before they were unable to pay. It is truly aftonishing how men should expect that dominion thus supported should continue long; that they could not fee that such victories both fowed and nourished the feeds of future war. Even the Portuguese historians adopted the impolitical uncommercial ideas of their governors. The villainy of the Portuguese merchants lost the profitable trade of Canton, and only a few escaped with great hazard, obliged to fight their way through the Chinese fleet. Next year Alonzo de Melo, ignorant of this, entered that harbour with four ships, which were instantly seized and the crews massacred by the enraged * Chinese. Faria y Sousa tea of China, at the port of Sanciam. And an event which refutes all the Jefuitical accounts of the greatness of the power and perfection of the Chinese government, soon gave them a better settlement. A pirate, named Tchang-si-lao,

[•] The Chinese, however, had too much Dutch policy utterly to expel any merchandize from their harbours. A few years after this, the Portuguese who brought gold from Africa and spicery from India were allowed to purchase the silks, porcelain, and makes an apology for mentioning this, and calls it a matter of trade, a subject unworthy of grave history.

While Sequeyra was engaged in a second attempt upon Dio, Duarte de Menezes arrived in India, and succeded him in office. Unmeaning slaughter on the coasts of Madagascar, the Red Sea, India, and the Maluco islands, comprise the whole history of his regency.

About this time died Emmanuel, king of Portugal. If this history seem to arraign his government, it will also prove how difficult it is for the most vigilant king always to receive just intelligence. For Emmanuel was both a great and a good king. Of great vigilance in council, of great magnanimity in the execution of all his enterprizes: Of great capacity in distinguishing the abilities of men, and naturally liberal in the reward of merit. If such a prince as Emmanuel erred, if his administration of Indian affairs in any instance arraign his policy, let it thence be inferred, what exactitude of intelligence is necessary to the happy government of a distant colony.

The maladministration of Indian affairs was now the popular complaint at the court of Lisbon. The traffic of India which had raised the Caliphs of Egypt to the height of their formidable power, and which had enriched Venice, was now found scarcely sufficient to support the military method of commanding it, practised by the Portuguese. A General of the first abilities was wanted, and the celebrated Vasco de Gama, old as he now was, honoured with the title of Count de Vidigueyra, was appointed Viceroy by John III. In 1524 Gama arrived the third time in India. Cochin, the faithful ally and chief trading port of the Portuguese, was threatened by a powerful army of the Zamorim, and the Indian seas were infested by numberless sleets of Moors, whom their enemies called pirates. To suppress these Gama sent different squadrons, who were successful in executing their orders. But while he meditated far greater made himself master of the little island of Macao. Here he built sleets which blocked up the ports of China, and laid seige to Canton itself. In this criss of distress the Chinese implored the assistance of the Portuguese, whom they had lately expelled as the worst of mankind. Two or three Portuguese sloops effected what the potent empire of China could not do, and the island of Macao was given them by the emperor, in reward of this eminent service. The porcelain of China is not so brittle, nor the sigures upon it more awkward, than the Chinese strength and policy must appear in the light which this event throws upon them.

designs, designs of the same exalted and liberal policy which had been begun by himself, and so gloriously prosecuted by Albuquerk, death, at the end of three months, closed the regency of Gama. It was the custom of the kings of Portugal to send commissions sealed up to India, with orders, which should be first opened when a successor to government was wanted. Gama, who brought with him three of these, finding the approach of dissolution, opened the first commission. And as Henry de Menezes, therein named, was at Goa, he appointed Lopez Vaz de Sampayo, a man of great abilities, to take the command till Menezes arrived. When Menezes arrived at Cochin, he prohibited the usual marks of public joy on his elevation, and said, it was more necessary to mourn for the loss of their late Viceroy. Nor did the public conduct of the new governor, the first, says Faria, who honoured the memory of his predecessor, deviate from this generous principle. A Portuguese vessel at this time committed feveral depredations on states at peace with Portugal. This ship, by order of Menezes, was taken, and the crew were impaled. A noble instance of justice, of more political service than all the victories of a Soarez. The danger of Cochin required war, and Menezes carried it into the territories of the Zamorim, whom he severely humbled. The Portuguese arms cleared the seas of pirates, took the strong city of Dofar, and reduced some valuable islands on the Red Sea. Great preparations were also made for the reduction of Dio, when Menezes, after a regency of thirteen months, died of a mortification in his leg. That he left the military power of the Portuguese much more formidable than he found it, is the least of his praise. Every where, at Ormuz in particular, he curbed the insolence and rapacity of his countrymen, and proved that time was only wanting for him to have restored the situation of India as left by Albuquerk. He convinced the Indian princes that rapacity was not the character of all the Portuguese, for he accepted of no present, though many, as the custom of the country, were offered to him. At his death, which happened in his thirtieth year, thirteen reals and an half, not a crown in the whole, was all the private property found in the possession of this young governor.

Other transactions now succeed. The second and third commissions, brought by Gama, were unopened, and lest he who was first named should be distant, Menezes, on his death-bed, appointed Francis de Sa to assume the command till the arrival of the proper governor. On opening the fecond commission, Pedro de Mascarenhas was found named. As this officer was at Malaca, a council was held, wherein it was refolved to set aside Francis de Sa, and open the third commisfion. Sampayo, who in this was appointed, took an oath to refign on the arrival of Mascarene, and immediately he assumed the power of government. Mascarene about this time performed some actions of great military splendor in defence of Malaca. The king of Bintam, with feveral auxiliary princes, who with numerous armies threatened destruction to the Portuguese settlement, were defeated by this brave officer. The Spaniards about this time took possession of some of the Maluco islands, where the treachery of the Portuguese had made their name odious. Don George de Menezes and Don Garcia Enriquez, two captains on this station, put one another alternately in irons. They at last came to a civil war, wherein Garcia was worsted; and Menezes was defeated by the Spaniards, who publickly executed some of his officers, as traitors to Charles V. to whom they owed no allegiance. Oppressed by the tyranny of the Moors, the king of Sunda implored the protection of the Portuguese, offered to pay a considerable tribute, and entreated them to built a fort in his dominions. Yet it was not in the power of Sampayo to restore the tranquillity of the Malucos, or to improve the offers of Sunda. He had engaged in a scheme of policy which settered his operations. One villainy must be defended by another, and the public interest must be secondary in the politics of the most able Usurper of unjust power. Sampayo was resolved to withhold the regency from Mascarene, and therefore to strengthen himself at Cochin was his first care. Where his own interest and that of the public were one, Sampayo behaved as a great commander; but where they were less immediately connected, that of the latter was even necessarily neglected, and fell into ruin. It was his interest to crush the Zamorim, and he gained considerable victories over Cutial, admiral of the most formidable fleet which had hitherto been fitted out from the ports of Calicut. Sampayo then failed to Goa, where Francis de Sa refused to acknowledge him as governor. This dispute was submitted to the council of the city, and the man in power was confirmed. Sa was then sent to build a fort in Sunda, but the politics of Sampayo could not spare a force sufficient to overawe the Moors, and Francis de Sa could not effect his design.

The artful Sampayo now wrote to the king of Portugal, that a most formidable hostile alliance was in meditation. The northern princes were ready to affift the king of Cambaya, and Solyman, the Turkish admiral, had promised the Soldan to drive the Portuguese from India, if he would give him a competent armament. It was the interest of Sampayo to make every preparation of defence, and every excuse for preparation. But he still kept near Cochin. The brave Hector de Sylveyra was fent to Dio and other places, and the reputation of the actions he performed strengthened the authority of the Usurper. A fleet of five ships now arrived from Portugal, and brought two new commissions. These were opened by Mexia, inspector of the revenue, and Lopez Vaz de Sampayo, contrary to the former commissions, was here named prior to Pedro de Mascarene. What an infatuation of government was this! Had all been happy in India, this must have banished harmony from the councils of the Portuguese, and for a time unhinged the operations of just authority. Sampayo, when he took the oath to resign to Mascarene, dispatched a message to Malaca with the tidings. Mascarene immediately assumed his power there, and Sampayo, who now expected his arrival, held a council at Cochin. It is almost needless to name the result. He was present, and in power; and it was resolved that Mascarene should not be acknowledged as governor. Sampayo then retired to Goa, and left Mexia at Cochin to give Mascarene the reception concerted between them. Immediately as Mascarene landed, Mexia's spear run him through the arm, several of his company were wounded by the armed attendants of Mexia, and a retreat to the fleet saved the lives of Mascarene and his friends.

When the tidings of this reached Goa, Henry Figuera supposed the friend of the ejected governor was dispossessed of the command of Coulam, and Mexia was by Sampayo appointed to succeed. Anthony de Sylveyra was sent to take Mascarene at sea, to put him in irons, and to deliver him prisoner to Simon de Menezes, commander of Conanor; all which was performed. This haughty tyranny, however, produced loud complaints.

The

The murmur was general at Goa. Souza, commander of Chaul, remonstrated, and the brave Hector de Sylveyra boldly upbraided Sampayo for his unworthy treatment of Mascarene, to whom a trial had been refused. Sampayo, fierce, resolute to persist; Hector retired, and summoned the council of Goa. A letter signed by three hundred, who promised to support him as governor, was fent to Mascarene. It was also agreed to seize Sampayo, but he was no stranger to this design, and imprisonment was the fortune of the brave Hector. Menezes, governor of Cananor, as foon as he received information from Goa of the cause why Mascarene was in chains, set him free, and, together with Souza, commandant of Chaul, and Anthony de Azevedo, admiral of the Indian seas, acknowledged him governor. The Portuguese were now on the eve of a war among themselves, when Azevedo and other leaders proposed to accommodate disputes by arbitration. Sampayo with great cunning managed this affair. He delayed his consent, though on the brink of ruin, till he knew who were named as judges, and till he had procured a pardon for Alonzo Mexia, his friend, who had attempted the life of Mascarene. Yet, though the defenders of this brave officer had influence to remove one of the appointed judges, and to add five others of their own nomination, the arts of Sampayo prevailed. The chief inhabitants of Cochin attended, and conscious of their former vote in council against Mascarene, declared, that if his title was preferred, they would revolt to the Moors. He who does a man an injury, generally becomes the rancorous enemy of the injured man; and even the friends of him whose power is on the decline, cautiously withdraw from his interest. The council of Goa, who had promifed to support, now deserted Mascarene, forward to make their peace where they feared to oppose. Sampayo was declared lawful governor, and Mascarene embarked for Lisbon, where he was honourably received by the king, and in reward of his merit, appointed governor of Azamor in Africa; on his return from whence he perished at sea.

Sampayo, now undisturbed by a rival, but conscious of the accusations which Mascarene would lay against him, exerted all his abilities to recommend himself to his sovereign. But Almeyda, not Albuquerk, was the pattern he imitated. The principal leaders of the Turkish sleet had been assassinated by the friends of each other, and their war ships were scattered in different places. Sampayo sent Azevedo to destroy all he could find, and Alonzo de Melo was dispatched with a proper force to erect a fort on the island of Sunda. What heavy accusation of his former conduct, devoted to his private interest, was this late execution of these important designs! Other captains were sent upon various expeditions. Hector de Sylveyra, one of the most gallant officers ever sent from Portugal to India, greatly distinguished himself; John Deza destroyed the remains of the Zamorim's fleets, commanded by Cutiale, a Chinese admiral; and Sampayo himself spread slaughter and devastation over the seas and shores of India. Every where, says Faria, there was fire and sword, ruin and destruction. In the midst of this bloody career, Nunio de Cunha arrived with a commission to succeed Sampayo. Sampayo pleaded to finish what he had begun, to clear the seas of pirates; and Nunio, according to the honour of that age, granted his request, that it might not be faid he had reaped the laurels already grasped by another. Some time after this, Nunio, in his way to Cochin, put into the harbour of Cananor. Sampayo, who happened to be there, sent his brother in law, John Deza, to Nunio, inviting him to come ashore and receive the resignation of the governor. But Nunio perhaps feared a snare, and he insisted that Sampayo should come on board. He came, and having refigned with the usual solemnities, was ordered by Nunio to attend him to Cochin, where, by order of the new governor, his effects. were feized and his person imprisoned. And soon after, amid the infults of the croud, he was put aboard a ship and sent prifoner to Lisbon, where his life and his property were left to the determination of the fovereign *.

carried to the castle, and there confined in a dungeon, where not even his wife was permitted to see him. After two years, the Duke of Braganza, who admired his military exploits, procured his trial. When he was brought before the king, who was surrounded with his council and judges, his long white beard which covered his face, and the other tokens of his sufferings, says Faria, might have moved Mascarene himself to forgiveness. He made a long masterly speech, wherein he enumerated his services, pleaded the necessities of public affairs,

When Sampayo was arrested, "Tell Nunio, said he, I have imprisoned others, and am now imprisoned, and one will come to imprison him." When this was reported, "Tell Sampayo, said Nunio, that I doubt it not; but there shall be this difference between us; he deserves imprisonment, but I shall not deserve it." When the ship which carried Sampayo arrived at the isle of Tercera, an officer, who waited his arrival, put him in irons. When he landed at Lisbon, he was set upon a mule, loaded with chains, and amid the insults of the populace,

The acts and character of this extraordinary man demand the attention of every country possessed of colonies. His abilities were certainly of the first rate, but having made one step of villany, the necessity of self-defence rendered his talents of little benefit, rather of great prejudice to his country. The Portuguese writers, indeed, talk in high terms of his eminent services and military glory. But there is a furer test than their opinion. The Indian princes fincerely mourned over the ashes of Albuquerk, whom they called their father; but there was a general joy on the departure of their tyrant Sampayo; a certain proof that his conduct was of infinite prejudice to the interest of Portugal. However high and dreadful they may feem, men in his situation never dare to punish without respect of the offender's connections. The tyranny of George de Menezes, governor of Maluco, under Sampayo, disgraces human nature. He openly robbed the houses of the Moorish merchants, cut off the hands of some, and looked on, while a magistrate, who had dared to complain, was, by his order, devoured by dogs *. If the embarrassment of Sanipayo was the only protection of this miscreant, others, however, had his fanction. Camoens, that enthusiast of his nation's honour, in an apostrophe to Mascarene, thus characterises the regency of the Usurper, "Avarice and ambition now in India fet their face openly against God and justice; a grief to thee, but not thy shame!" And Camoens is exceeding accurate in the facts of history, and with the rest of his countrymen, admires the military renown of Sampayo. But if Sampayo humbled the Moors, it should also be remembered that, according to Faria, these people had improved the and urged the examples of others, who had been rewarded. His defence staggered the king's resolution against him, but his usurpation could not be forgiven. He was sentenced to pay Mascarene 10,000 ducats, to forfeit his allowance as governor, and to be banished into Africa. But he was afterwards allowed to return in a private station to Portugal. His friend Alonzo Mexia, the inspector of the revenue, was also severely punished, if less than his rapacity deserved, may be called severe.

This tyrant, on his return to Lisbon, was banished to the Brazils, where, in a rencounter with the natives, he was taken prisoner, and died the death of an American captive. The victim is tied to a tree, his teeth and nails are drawn, burning wood is held to every tender part, his roafted fingers are put into the bowl of a pipe and smoaked by the savages; his tormentors with horrid howls dance round him, wounding him at every turn with their poignards; his eyes are at last thrust out, and he is let loose to stagger about as his torture impels him! As soon as he expires, his dissevered limbs are boiled in the war-kettle, and devoured by his executioners. While George de Menezes suffered this torture, charity would hope that the remembrance of his cruelties in India gave him his severest pains.

divisions made by his politics, greatly to the hurt of the Portuguese settlements. And when he did conquer, pushed on by the rage to do something eminent, every victory was truly Gothic, and was in its consequence uncommercial. It is not earthquakes and whirlwinds that revive a blighted harvest; the gentle rains and mild dews of heaven alone diffuse fertility, and heal the chasms of the withered soil. Malaca, while governed by the injured Mascarene, was the only division of Portuguese Asia where commerce slourished. After his departure, all was wretchedness; Portuguese against Portuguese, piracy and rapine here and at the Malucos. In what condition the rest were left by Sampayo will foon appear.

The king of Cochin, the valuable ally and auxiliary of the Portuguese, was confined by the small-pox when Nunio arrived. Nunio offered to wait upon him, but the king declined the interview on account of the infection, though a fight of the new governor, he added, he was fure would cure his fever. Nunio waited upon him, and heard a long lift of the injuries and rapine committed by Sampayo and Mexia. Thefe, in true policy, Nunio. redressed; and the king, who complained that he had been kept as a flave in his own palace, was now made happy. Nunio visited the other princes in alliance with Portugal, and at every court and harbour found oppression and injustice. At Ormuz in particular, tyranny and extortion had defied resistance. Nunio foothed and redressed the wrongs of the various princes. Proclamation was made every where, inviting the injured Moors and Indians to appear before him and receive redress. Many appeared, and to the aftonishment of all India, justice was conspicuously distributed. Raez Xarafo, the creature of Sampayo, prime minister, or rather tyrant of the king of Ormuz, stood. accused of the most horrid crimes of office. Rapine was defended by murder; and the spirit of industry, crushed to the ground, fighed for support amid the desolate streets. Innocence and industry were now protected by Nunio, and Xarafo, though a native of India, was fent in irons to Lisbon to take his trial. Nor was Nunio forgetful of the enemies, while thus employed in restoring to prosperity the allies of Portugal*. Hector de Melinda and Zanzibar to great distress. Nunio reduced Mombaza to ashes, and lest a garrison at Melinda, which afterwards rendered considerable service to that city.

Before his arrival, Nunio greatly diftinguished himself on the Ethiopian coast.
 The king of Mombaza, in hatred to the Portuguese, had again reduced the kings of Sylveyra, with a large fleet, made a line across the gulph at the mouth of the Red Sea, and let not a Moorish or Egyptian vessel escape. Anthony Galvam, a very enthusiast in honesty, was fent by Nunio to succeed Ataide, governor of the Malucos, a villain who trod in the steps of Menezes. All was in confusion when Galvam arrived; but he had infinitely more difficulty, fays Faria, to suppress the villainy of the Portuguese, than to quell the hostile natives. By his wisdom, however, resolution, and most scrupulous integrity, the Malucos once more became a flourishing settlement, and the neighbouring kings, some of whom he had vanquished, entreated his continuance when he received his recal. Anthony de Sylveyra spread the terror of his arms along the hostile coast of Cambaya, and from thence to Bengal. Stephen de Gama, son of the great Vasco, was sent to Malaca, which he effectually fecured, by the repeated defeats of the neighbouring princes in hostility. And the governor himself attempted Dio; but while employed in the reduction of the strongly fortified island of Beth, where the brave Hector de-Sylveyra fell, a great reinforcement, commanded by Mustapha, a Turk, entered Dio, and enabled that city to hold out against all the vigorous attacks of Nunio.

While the governor was thus employed in restoring the strength of the Portuguese settlements, scenes, new to the Portuguese, opened, and demanded the exertion of all his wisdom and abilities. One of those brutal wars, during which the eastern princes desolate kingdoms and shed the blood of millions, now broke forth. Badur, king of Guzarat or Cambaya, one of those horrid characters common in oriental history, ascended the throne, through the blood of his father and elder brothers. Innumerable other murders, acts of perfidy and unjust invasions of his neighbours, increased his territories, when the Mogul, or king of Delhi, sent a demand of homage and tribute. Badur flayed the ambassadors alive, and boasted that thus he would always pay his tribute and homage. Armies of about 200,000 men were raised on each side, and alternately destroyed, sometimes by the sword, sometimes by famine. New armies were repeatedly mustered, inferior kingdoms were desolated as they marched along, but Badur was at last reduced to the lowest extremity. In his distress he implored the affistance of the Portuguese, and not only yielded Dio, a city among almost almost inaccessible rocks, but gave permission to Nunio to fortify it as he pleased *. The Mogul also made large offers, but those of Badur were accepted, and the king of Delhi's army soon after withdrew from Cambaya. Abraham, king of Decan, entitled Hydal Can, had about this time laid seige to Golconda with an army of near half a million, but Cotamaluco, the prince whom he besieged, found means to defeat him by famine. Abraham had dethroned his own brother, Mulacham, and thrust out his eyes. Azadacam, an expert Mohammedan, at the head of a large army, endeavoured to revenge Mulacham, when the people of Decan, desolated by these brutal wars, entreated Nunio to take the dominion of their country, and deliver them from utter ruin. As the Decan forms the continent opposite to Goa, the offer was accepted, and ratified by the consent of Azadacam. Azadacam now fled to the king of Bifnagar, the old enemy of the Decan, and Abraham, now affifted by Catamaluco, the prince whom he besieged in Golconda, invaded Bisnagar with an army of 400,000 men and 700 elephants. But while human blood flowed in rivulets, Azadacam made his peace with Abraham, and Cotamaluco joined the king of Bisnagar. King Badur, who owed his crown to the Portuguese, now meditating their destruction, entered into a league with the Hydal Can. And Azadacam, who had ratified the treaty, by which the miserable inhabitants of Decan had put themselves under the Portuguese dominion, now advised his master to recover his territory by force of arms. A war ensued, but neither Azadacam, nor Solyman Aga with his Persian auxiliaries, could expel the Portuguese. Hydal Can, tired by the groans of the people, ordered hostilities to cease, but was not obeyed by Azadacam, who, to cover his treason, attempted to poison Hydal Can. Yet soon after the traitor bought his par-

One Iago Botello performed the most wonderful voyage, perhaps, upon record, on this occasion. He was an exile in India, and as he knew how earnessly the king of Portugal desired the possession of Diu, he hoped, that to be the messenger of the agreeable tidings would procure his pardon. Having got a draught of the fort, and a copy of the treaty with Badur, he set fail on pretence for Cambaya, in a vessel only fixteen seet and an half long, nine broad, and four and a half deep. Three Portuguese, his servants, and some Indian slaves, were his crew. When out at sea he discovered his true purpose: this produced a mutiny, in which all that were sailors were killed. Botello, however, proceeded, and arrived at Lisbon, where his pardon was all his reward. His vessel, by the king's order, was immediately burned, that such evidence of the safety and ease of the voyage to India might not remain.

don with gold, for gold is omnipotent in the fordid courts of the East. Nunio, however, compelled Azadacam to a truce, but a new enemy immediately arose. The Zamorim, encouraged by Badur, raised an army of about 50,000 men, but was fix times defeated by the Portuguese. Badur had now recourse to perfidy. He entreated a conference with Nunio at Diu, and with Souza, the governor of the fort, with intention to affaffinate them both. But ere his scheme was ripe, Souza, one day, in stepping into Badur's barge, fell into the water. He was taken up in safety, but some Portuguese, who at a distance beheld his danger, rowed up hastily to his assistance, when Badur, troubled with a villain's fears, ordered Souza to be killed. Four Portuguese gentlemen immediately boarded his barge, and rushed on the tyrant. Iago de Mesqueta wounded him, but though these brave men lost their lives in the attempt, they forced Badur to leap over board for fafety. A commotion in the bay enfued, and the king, unable to fwim any longer, called out aloud who he was, and begged affistance. A Portuguese officer held out an oar, but as Badur laid hold of it, a common foldier, moved with honest indignation, struck him over the face with a halbert, and repeating his blows, delivered the world of a tyrant, whose remorfeless perfidy and cruelty had long difgraced human nature.

In this abridged view of the dark barbarous politics, unblushing perfidy, and desolating wars of king Badur, the king of Delhi, and the Hydal Can, we have a complete epitome of the history of India. Century after century contains only a repetition of the same changes in policy, the same desolations, and the same deluges of spilt blood. And who can behold so horrid a picture without perceiving the inestimable benefits which MAY BE DIFFUSED over the East by a potent settlement of Europeans, benefits which true policy, which their own interest demand from their hands, which have in part been given, and certainly will one day be largely diffused. Nunio, as much as possibly he could, improved every opportunity of convincing the natives, that the friendship of his countrymen was capable of affording them the furest defence. Greatly superior to the gross ideas of Gothic conquest he addressed himself to the reason. and the interests of those with whom he negociated. He called. a meeting of the principal inhabitants and merchants of Cambaya, baya, and laid the papers of the dead king before them. By these, the treacherous designs of king Badur fully appeared, and his negociation to engage the Grand Turk to drive the Portuguese from India was detected. Coje Zofar, one of the first officers of Badur, and who was present at his death, with several others, witnessed the manner of it. And Moors and Pagans alike acquitted the Portuguese. Letters, to this purpose, in Arabic and Persic, signed by Coje Zofar and the chief men of Cambaya, were dispersed by Nunio every where in India and the coasts of Arabia. Nor did this great politician stop here. Superior to bigottry, he did not look to the Pope's Bull for the foundation of authority. The free exercise of the Mohammedan and Brahmin religions was permitted in every Portuguese territory, and not only the laws, the officers appointed, but even the pensions given by king Badur, were continued. The Portuguese settlements now enjoyed prosperity. A privateering war with the Moors of Mecca, and some hostilities in defence of the princes, his allies, were the fole incumbrances of Nunio, while India was again steeped in her own blood. While the new king of Cambaya was dethroned, while Omaum king of Delhi lost an army of above 400,000 men in Bengal, and while Xercham, the king of that country, together with his own life, lost almost as many in the seige of Calijor, Nunio preserved his territory in the Decan in a state of peace and safety, the envy of the other provinces of India. But the armament of the Turk, procured by Badur, now arrived, and threatened the destruction of the Portuguese. Selim, Sultan of Constantinople, a few years before, had defeated the Soldan of Egypt, and annexed his dominions to the Turkish empire. The Mohammedan, strength was now more consolidated than ever. The Grand Turk was at war, and meditated conquests in Europe. The traffic of India was the mother and nurse of his naval strength, and the presents sent by king Badur gave him the highest idea of the riches of Indostan. Seventy large vessels, well supplied with cannon and all military stores, under the command of Solyman, Bashaw of Cairo, sailed from the port of Suez, to extirpate the Portuguese from India. The seamen were of different nations, many of them Venetian galleyflaves, taken in war, all of them trained failors; and 7000 Janisaries were destined to act on shore. Some Portuguese Renegados gados were also in the fleet; and Coje Zofar, who had hitherto been the friend of Nunio, with a party of Cambayans, joined Solyman. The hostile operations began with the seige of Dio, but when Nunio was ready to fail to its relief with a fleet of eighty vessels, Garcia de Noronha arrived with a commission to fucceed him as governor. Nunio immediately refigned, and Noronha, in providing a greater fleet, by a criminal loss of time, reduced the garrison of Dio to the greatest extremity. Here the Portuguese shewed miracles of bravery. Anthony de Sylveyra, the commander, was in every place. Even the women took arms; the officers ladies went from rampart to rampart upbraiding the least appearance of langour. Juan Roderigo, with a barrel of power in his arms, passed his companions, make way, he cried, I carry my own and many a man's death. His own, however, he did not, for he returned fafe to his station; but above a hundred of the enemy were destroyed by the explosion of the powder, which he threw upon one of their batteries. Of 600 men who at first were in the garrison, forty were not now able to bear arms, when Coje Zofar, irritated by the insolence of Solyman, forged a letter to the garrison, which promised the immediate arrival of Noronha. This, as he defigned, fell into the hands of Solyman, who immediately hoisted his fails, and with the shattered remains of his formidable fleet, fled to Arabia, where, to avoid punishment, he died by his own hands.

But while Nunio restored the affairs of India, the political canker at the court of Lisbon accumulated its malignity. He did not amuse them with the glare of unmeaning Gothic conquests, and the wisdom of his policy was unperceived. Even their historians seem insensible of it, and even the author of Histoire Philosophique, in his account of the Portuguese politics, pays no attention to Nunio, though he even improved upon the ideas of Albuquerk. In place of rewards, chains were prepared in Portugal for this great commander; but his death at sea, after a happy regency of about ten years, prevented the completion of his country's ingratitude.

When Noronha was fent to supercede Nunio, an allegorical poet might feign that the demon of infatuation directed the councils of Lisbon. Noronha's regency began with an infamous delay of the fuccours destined by Nunio for Dio. Coje Zofar, by by the same spirit of delay, was permitted, long after the departure of Solyman, to harrass the Portuguese of that important place. The Hydal Can, many other princes, and even the Zamorim himself, awed by the dignity and justice of Nunio's government, entreated the alliance of Portugal, and Noronha had the honour to negociate a general peace; a peace, which on the part of the Zamorim, gave the Portuguese every opportunity to strengthen their empire, for it continued thirty years.

These transactions, the privateering war with the Moors, some skirmishes in Ccylon, the design, contrary to the king's commission, to appoint his son to succeed him, his death, and the public joy which it occasioned, comprise the history of the regency of the unworthy successor of the generous Nunio.

Both the Portuguese and the natives gave unseigned demonstrations of joy on the appointment of Stephen de Gama, the fon of the great Vasco. By his first act he ordered his private estate to be publickly valued, and by his second he lent a great fum to the treasury, which by Noronha was left exhausted. He vifited and repaired the forts, and refitted the fleets in every harbour. By his officers he defeated the king of Achem, who disturbed Malaca. He restored tranquility in Cambaya, where the Portuguese territory was invaded by a powerful army, led by Bramaluco, a prince who had been dethroned by king Badur. His brother Christoval he sent on an expedition into Ethiopia*, and the governor himself sailed to the Red Sea with a fleet, equipped at his own expence. Here he gave a severe wound to the Turkish naval strength. But while every thing was in prosperity under the brave and generous Stephen, he was suddenly superceded by the elevation of Martin Alonzo de Souza. Though no policy can be more palpably ruinous than that which recalls a governor of decided abilities ere he can possibly complete any plan of importance; yet fuch recalls, ere now, had been issued from the court of Lisbon. But none of them, perhaps, gave a deeper wound to the Portuguese interest than this. Stephen de Gama trod in the steps of his father and of Albuquerk. Souza's actions were of a different character. He began his government with every exertion to get witnesses to impeach his predecessor, but though he pardoned a murderer on that condition, every accusation was refuted, and Stephen de Gama was received with great honour at Lisbon. Having refused to give his hand, however, to a bride, chosen for him by John III. he found it convenient to banish himself from his native country, the country which his father had raised to its highest honours. He retired therefore to Venice, his estate 40,000 crowns less than when he entered upon his short government of two years and one month.

Wars of a new character now took place. By the toleration which Nunio gave to the religions of the natives, he rendered the Portuguese settlements happy and slourishing. But gloomy fuperstition now prevailed, and Souza was under the direction of priests, who esteemed the butcheries of religious persecution as the service of heaven. The temples of Malabar were laid in ashes, and thousands of the unhappy natives, for the crime of idolatry, were flaughtered upon their ruined altars. This the Portuguese historians mention as the greatest honour of the piety of their countrymen, ignorant of the detestation which fuch cruelty must certainly bring upon the religion which inspires it: ignorant too, that true religion, under the toleration of a Nunio, possesses its best opportunity to conquer the heart by the display of its superior excellence. At the seige of Batecala, the Portuguese soldiers quarrelled about the booty, and while fighting with each other, were attacked by the natives and driven to their ships. The pay of the common soldiers had been diminished by Souza, and they freely owned that this was the cause of the mutiny. The city afterward was taken, and the streets ran with blood; such was the rage of the army to recompence themselves by plunder. The king of Ormuz, unable to pay the exorbitant tribute exacted from him, which was now fix times more than the tax imposed by Albuquerk, resigned his revenues to the Portuguese. Azadacam, now in open war with his mafter the Hydal Can Abraham, drew Souza to his party. The design was to dethrone Abraham, who had been always friendly to the Portuguese, and to place Meale Can his brother in his dominions. The Portuguese officers murmured at this shameless injustice, but only Pedro de Faria, trusting to his venerable years, had the courage to remonstrate with the governor. Souza, haughty as he was, listened to the man of fourscore, and confessed that he had saved both his life and his honour. The attempt, however, was highly resented by the Hydal Can, who gathered such a storm to crush the Portuguese, that Souza, foreseeing the tempest that was hovering over him, threatened to open the commissions, and resign to the governor next named. He complained that he could not govern men who had neither truth nor honour; he did not consider, however, that his unjust treatment of the common soldiers occasioned their disorder and disobedience. But while he thus meditated a cowardly and treacherous retreat, treacherous because it was to desert his post in the hour of danger, a steet from Portugal brought the great John de Castro, the successor of the embarrassed undetermined Souza.

The naval and military strength of the Portuguese in India was in a fickly condition. Great discontent among the few who were honest; all was villainy and disorder among the rest. The natives, earnest for their total extirpation, from different provinces joined Hydal Can, and their warlike operations began with the seige of Diu. John de Mascarene, the governor, made a brave defence, and the Portuguese displayed many prodigies of valour. Azadacam, Coje Zofar, and others, of the greatest military reputation, directed the attacks, and lost their lives in the feige. Whenever a breach was made, the Turks and Indians pressed on by ten thousands, but were always repulsed. Unnumbered artillery thundered on every fide, and mines were sprung, by one of which Fernando, the son of Castro, was with his battallion blown up in the air. After eight months Castro arrived with a large fleet, and without opposition entered the fort. From thence he marched out at the head of 2500 Portuguese and some auxiliaries of Cochin. The numerous army of Hydal Can continued in their trenches, which were defended with ramparts and a profusion of artillery. But the enemy were driven from their works, and purfued with incredible flaughter through the streets of the city. Rume Can, the son of Zofar, rallied about 8000 of his bravest troops, and was totally defeated by Castro*. It was necessary to prosecute the war, and the not, the Priest led them to victory. A weapon broke off an arm of the crucifix, and Cazal exclaiming aloud, facriledge, facriledge, revenge the facriledge, inspired a fury which determined the battle. In many other engagements the leaders promoted

During the heat of this engagement, Father Cazal, with a crucifix on the point of a spear, greatly animated the Portuguese. Rume Can, notwithstanding all the efforts of Castro, put his troops at last in great disorder. But though the General could governor, in great want of money to carry it on, defired the citizens of Goa to advance a loan of 20,000 pardaos, for which he fent them a lock of his mustacheos in pledge. A security indeed uncommon; but which included in it a fignal pawn of his honour. More money than he required was fent, and even the women stript themselves of their bracelets and other jewels to fupply his want. The jewels, however, he returned, and having with great affiduity improved his naval and military strength, he and his captains carried fire and sword over the dominions of the hostile princes, while Hydal Can, with an army of 150,000 men, retired before him. The king of Achem was also defeated at Malaca, and the stubborn villainy of the debauched Portuguese soldiers and traders was the only enemy unfubdued. While he laboured in this much more arduous war, in correcting the abuses of the revenue, and the distribution of justice, grief, it is said, impaired Castro's health and hastened his end, at a time when Hydal Can and all who had been in arms against the Portuguese were suing for peace. On the approach of death he appointed a council of felect persons to take the management of affairs. And so poor was the great Castro, that the first act of this committee was an order to supply the expences of his death-bed from the king's revenue; for a few reals, not half a dozen, was all the property found in his cabinet.

Garcia de Sa, an experienced officer, succeeded this great man, and concluded the various treaties of peace, procured by the arms, and in agitation at the death of Castro, greatly to the advantage and honour of Portugal. Here Camoens ends his prophetic song, and here also the most important period of the history of the Portuguese empire in Asia is naturally wound up. A repetition of the same oppressive impolitical measures, which had often armed the East against them, describes the conduct of the governors who ruled India for twenty years after Castro. But the rapine of individuals every year became more shameless and more general. Indian women of quality were publickly their interest in this manner. They often saw the sign of the cross in the air, and at different times some Moorish prisoners enquired after the beautiful young woman, and venerable old man, who appeared in the front of the Portuguese squadrons. And the Portuguese soldiers, who saw no such personages, were thus taught to believe themselves under the particular care of the Virgin and St. Joseph.

dragged from their friends by Portuguese ravishers. When the Count de Redonda was governor, a Portuguese ship, contrary to the treaty of peace, was attacked by three vessels of Malabar. , Redonda complained, and was answered by the Zamorim, that fome rebels had done it, whom he was welcome to feize and chastise. Irritated by this reply, he sent Dominic de Mesquita with three ships to scour the coast of Malabar. And Mesquita foon murdered above 2000 Malabrians, the greatest part of whom were fewed up in their own fail cloths and wantonly drowned. When the Zamorim complained, Redonda retorted his own reply, "It was done by rebels, whom he was welcome to seize and chastise." A spirited reprisal is often the most decisive measure; but this inhuman one, furely, was not dictated by wisdom. Harrassed by their cruel awful tyrants, who trampled on every law of humanity and good policy, the princes of India combined in a general league for the utter extirpation of the Portuguese. Eastern politics never produced a better concerted plan of operation than this, and so confident were the natives of fuccess, that not only the possessions of the Portuguese, but the most beautiful of their wives and daughters were also divided among them. Five years was this league in forming; at last, at the same instant, the king of Ternate attacked the Malucos, the king of Achem invaded Malaca, the queen of Garzopa carried her arms against Onor; Surat was seized by Agalachem, a prince tributary to the Mogul; the Hydal Can attacked Chaul, Daman, Bazaim and Goa; and the Zamorim laid seige to Mangalor, Cochin and Cananor. And even the ancient Christians of St. Thomas, persecuted by the archbishops of Goa, for non-submission to the See of Rome, joined the Pagans and Mohammedans against the natives of Portugal. But where even the embers of virtue remain, danger and an able general will awake them into a flame. Luis de Ataide, the Portuguese governor, was advised to withdraw his troops from the exterior parts for the support of Goa, the seat of their empire. But this he gallantly refused, and even permitted a fleet with 400 men to sail for Portugal. No sooner did he gain an advantage in one place than he sent relief to another. He and the best troops hastened from fort to fort, and victory followed victory, till the leaders of this most formidable combination fued for peace. A fignal proof of what valour and military art may do against the greatest multitudes of undisciplined militia.

The brave Ataide, after his return to Portugal, was fent a fecond time Viceroy to India*, where, foon after the defeat of king Sebastian in Africa, he died of melancholy, so deeply was he affected with the fall of his country, which he forefaw and foretold. Gama, Albuquerk, and Nunio de Cunha, certainly understood the great principles upon which a foreign commerce can only be established and rendered secure. But the court of Lisbon, and most of the other governors, never perceived the true interest of their empire. When errors in government begin, the wife see the secret disease, but it is the next generation that feels the worst of its effects. Camoens, whose political penetration was perhaps unequalled in his age and country, faw the declension of manners, and foretold in vain the fall of empire. Portugal owed its existence to the spirit of chivalry and the ideas of liberty, which were confirmed by the statutes of Lamego. Camoens, in a fine allegory, laments the decay of the ancient virtues. Under the character of a huntsman he paints the wild romantic pursuits of king Sebastian, and wishes that he may not fall the victim of his blind passion. The courtiers he characterises.

* Ataide often checked the wild pursuits of the young king Sebastian, and strongly opposed his romantic desire to head an expedition in Africa. The Prince, to be eased of the restraint of his presence, sent Ataide a tecond time to India, and in a speech which he made to him, strongly characterised the frivolousness which now prevailed in the cabinet of Portugal. Don Constantine de Braganza, of the blood royal, never performed one action which did honour to his abilities. The officers he fent out on various expeditions were generally defeated. He himself shared the same fate, and once saved his life by inglorious flight. His views were of no importance. He imprisoned Luis de Melo for losing too much time in a victorious expedition on the coast of Malabar. In a descent on Ceylon the Portuguese seized the tooth of a monkey, a relick held sacred by the Pagans, for which, according to Linfehoten, 700,000 ducats were offered in ransom; but Constantine ordered it to be burned. The kings of Siam and Pegu pretended the real tooth was saved by a Banian, and each afferting he was in possession of the genuine one, bloody wars, which much endangered the Portuguese eastern settlements, were kindled; and Constantine, sinding himself embarrassed, resigned, contrary to the desire of Sebastian. Ataide, on the contrary, had performed most incredible actions, had saved the Portuguese from the greatest dangers they ever surmounted in Asia. Yet when the second time Ataide went out Viceroy, Sebastian did not bid him reign as he had formerly done. No, he bade him reign like Don Constanssine —— a whisser, whose abilities reached no farther than perhaps to open a ball gracefully, for his politeness was his only commendation.

With flattery's manna'd lips assails the throne.

And the clergy, the men of letters

To plan new laws to arm the regal power,
Sleepless at night's mid hour to raze the laws,
The facred bulwarks of the people's cause,
Framed ere the blood of hard-earn'd victory
On their brave father's helm-hackt swords was dry.

Unperceived by the unlettered nobility, the principles of the constitution gradually expired under the artful increase of the royal perogative. If Sebastian was more absolute than John the First, his power was bought by the degeneracy and weakness of his subjects, the certain price with which monarchs purchase their beloved despotism. The neglect of one man of merit is the fignal for the worthless, if rich, to croud to court. Many of these signals were given in the reigns of Emmanuel, John III. Sebastian, and his successor the Cardinal Henry; and thus the labours of an Albuquerk, a Nunio, a Castro, and an Ataide, were frustrated and reversed. These governors, bred in war, enthusiasts in honour, all died poor. Xarafo, the creature of Sampayo, the tyrant of his master the king of Ormuz, charged with murders and the most unbounded extortion, was sent in irons to Lisbon. But he carried his treasures with him, and was restored to his employments. Anthony Galvam, the most honest of men, saved the Malucos, returned poor to Portugal, and like Pacheco, died in an alms-house. Some of the first nobility and princes of the blood were after Castro made Viceroys of India. Nor came they there on purpose to return with empty coffers*. Under the shade of silken umbrellas they rode to territory and vassal princes, assorded only 1,000,000 crowns, the highest annual sum received by the kings of Portugal, a sum often purchased by armaments of much superior expence. Though a king of Ceylon was so ignorant as to resuse a present of tapestry from the Portuguese, his allies, because the figures upon it, he said, were inchanted men, who would kill him in the night

The governors of India, about this time, cleared 800,000 ducats per annum. 200,000 was the falary of the commanders of fome forts, beside the profits of trade, which were immense, for the ships they sent to Europe were loaded with the plunder of their rapine. Yet at this time all the royal revenue which arose from the customs, and all the tribute paid by the acquired battle in chairs carried on men's shoulders. All was luxury, weakness, and unlimitted oppression. Ataide effected a glorious recovery of the Portuguese affairs, but they soon relapsed with doubled confusion into their former disorder. Both before and after this period, a long succession of governors, in one uniform course, regardless of the injury which the commerce of their country sustained by their depredations, studiously kindled unjust wars, that they might enrich themselves by the enormous plunder. Sebastian lost his crown in Africa, and was succeeded by an old weak man, his grand uncle Cardinal Henrico. Two years closed Henry's pusillanimous sway, and Philip II. of Spain foon after made himself master of the kingdom of Portugal. Totally engrossed by their immense American empire and the politics of Europe, the Spanish court paid little attention to Portuguese India. Little or no supplies arrived from Europe. The commanders on the different stations ceased to act in concert with each other. Unrestrained by a regular government, each endeavoured to enrich himself. Their mother country groaned under the yoke of Spain. Mostly natives of the East, the Portuguese in India lost all affection for Portugal, and indeed the political chain which bound them together was now but a slender thread. The will of the captain of the fort was absolute, and his protection of the most audacious plunderers was the support of his power. Around the Malucos, fort after fort fell into the hands of the neighbouring princes. Some of the Portuguese were impaled, others entered into the service of their conquerors, and in many actions fought against each other with the greatest rancour. In this wretched condition of Portuguese Asia, Houtman, a Dutch merchant, in jail for debt at Lisbon, planned the establishment of his countrymen in the East. The Hollanders paid his debts; he failed for the East, and returned with credentials of his promise, which gave birth to the Dutch India company, an institution of deep commercial time; Though the general opinion of India efteemed the Portuguese as a race superior to other men; You are among men, said an Indian, what lions are among beasts, and nature has appointed that your species should be equally sew for the same reason; Though such ignorance of the natives facilitated the Portuguese victories, some, however, had more reason. Let them alone, said one Indian prince to another, their management of their revenue, and their love of luxury, will foon ruin them. And a king of Perfia afked a Portuguese captain, how many of their Indian Viceroys had been beheaded by the kings of Portugal? None, replied the officer: then you will not long, returned the Persian, be the masters of India.

wisdom. In Java and the Malucos, where the Portuguese were weakest, the Dutch began their operations, and from thence carried their hostilities into Bengal and the other parts of India. The Portuguese valour seemed to revive, and the Dutch, in many engagements, were defeated. Their vanquished fleets, however, carried rich cargoes to Europe, and brought fresh fupplies. The Portuguese Jesuits omitted no invention that might inflame the natives against them; even their republican form of government was urged as big with ruin to the Indian princes. But the detestation of the Portuguese name was deep in India; and that rooted odium, to which their villainies and cruelties had given birth and had long nourished, was now felt to militate against them more than millions in arms. Had the general conduct of the Portuguese governors been like that of Albuquerk, had the princes of India mourned over their graves, no strangers had ever established themselves on the ruin of fuch allies. Though repeatedly defeated in war, the Dutch commerce increased, the harbours of India received them with kindness, and gave them assistance, while the friendless detested Portuguese, though victorious in almost every skirmish, were harrassed out and daily weakened. Like beasts of prey in their dens, or mountaineer banditti, they kept their gloomy fortresles, their destruction the wish of the natives, who yet were afraid too openly to provoke the rage of these wolves and tygers. Five years after the arrival of the Dutch, the English also appeared in India. The Dutch, who pleaded the law of nature, without ceremony entered the best harbours, and endeavoured to drive the Portuguese from their settlements. The English, in 1601, under Sir James Lancaster, erected several factories in India, but they went to ports open to all, and interfered with neither Dutch, Portuguese, nor Moorish settlement. Twenty English fleets made the voyage to India without hostility, when the Portuguese Jesuits brought on a rupture, which ended in the loss of the Portuguese military reputation. Every treacherous art which the Moors practifed against Gama was repeated by the Jesuits, and the event was the same. The Jesuit Pinneus influenced the Mogul against the English, and commerce with them was interdicted. While Captain Best in a large ship, and Captain Salmon in a bomb ketch, lay near Surat, Nunio de Cunha, with four large galliots and twenty-five frigates, was fent sent to destroy them. An Indian, who had been aboard the English ships, told Nunio that they had not above a week's provision, and that he had nothing to do but to prevent them to take in fresh water. Nunio replied, that he would not spend a week's provisions upon his own men to purchase a victory that might be gained in an hour. And in the same high spirit he sent Canning, an English prisoner in his custody, to help his countrymen to fight, boasting, that he would foon take him again with more company. As Nunio advanced, with red banners displayed, Best weighed his anchors, and began the fight in the centre of the four large galliots; and Captain Salmon, in the bomb ketch, behaved with equal courage *. The Mogul had an army at this time upon the shore. The beach and the eminences were covered with spectators. And now those who had deemed the Portuguese invincible at sea, with astonishment beheld nine and twenty ships vanquished and put to flight by two vessels. But they knew not that the victors had fought under a Drake and a Raleigh. After the arrival of the Dutch, the Spanish court began to pay some attention to India, and supplies were sent against them and the English. But Thomas Best, in a harder conflict, was again victorious. Azevedo, the Viceroy nominated by Spain, prepared an armament of eight vessels, each of about 600 tons, and fixty frigates; but though often braved by the English, reinforced only with four ships, to the deeper astonishment of all India, he declined the combat, and suffered the English, unmolested, to proceed homeward with loaded ships. The reputation of the Portuguese valour was now no more. The Dutch power increased, and the natives in every Withington, a writer of king James's time, thus mentions this engagement, "Capt. Salmon, of the bomb ketch, the Ofiander, was like a Salamander amid the fire, dancing the hay about the Portuguefe, frisking and playing like a falmon." The Portuguefe writers ascribe these victories to the excellence of the English and incapacity of their own gunners. Soon after, however, the English commerce in India greatly declined. The Dutch pretended that their hostilities in India were in revenge of the Spanish tyranny in the Netherlands. Portugal also bended down beareath the same cruel yoke; yet this, in the Dutch logic, was her crime; and thus, because the Portuguese groaned under Spanish oppression, the Spanish oppression in the Netherlands was revenged upon them. The truth is, the Portuguese settlements were little regarded by Spain, and the Dutch intruded upon them as the stronger boars in a German forest shoulder the weaker ones from the best fall of acorns. Though beat off by the herdsmen, the stronger boars persist and return; so the Dutch persisted, till they secured possession. Every thing, however, was different in the first settlement of the English. The Author of Histoire Philosophique, &c. seems to decry the policy place openly declared war against them. Philip de Brito Nicote, whose bravery and villainy were the scourge and terror of Siam and the adjacent regions, after a brave defence, was overpowered in his strong fort of Siriam. His wife and soldiers were maimed and fent into flavery. He himself and his malekindred were impaled on the ramparts of his garrison. While the memory of the injuries suffered by the natives thus poured destruction upon the unpitied Portuguese, the Spanish court compleated the ruin of their eastern empire. The expence of the supplies lately sent, far exceeded the advantages reaped by Spain. And Azevedo, the Viceroy, received an order from the court of Madrid, to dispose of every employment, of every office under him, by public sale, that money might be raised to support his government. We now need add no circumstance more. The history of the fall of the Portuguese empire is here complete. Every thing after was headlong declension. A succession of governors continued, and still continue; but of all their numerous settlements on every coast of the eastern world, policy of their first captains, who made themselves masters of no port, but bought their cargoes of the native merchants, an uncertain foundation of continuance, according to him, though the English trade with China is now carried on in this manner. With all the fang froid of a materialist phi-losopher, the English perceived, says he, that great riches could not be acquired anith-out great injustice, and that to attain the advantages enjoyed by the Portuguese and Dutch, they must also adopt their measures, and establish themselves by force of arms. But James, he adds, as if he condemned fuch narrow policy, was too pufillanimous, and too much engaged in controverfial divinity, to allow warlike operations. The treaty of the English with the potent king of Persia, however, he mentions as an effort of great political wisdom. But Sir D. Cotton's embassy into Persia, in the Clarendon State Papers, Vol. I. p. 36. fol. throws another light upon this affair. The treaty with Persia was the idlest step the English could possibly have taken. According to this authentic record, the great monarch of Persia appears little better than a captain of Italian banditti; and his prime minister, raised from the meanest station, was a greater shuffler and villain than his. master. The treaty with Persia, indeed, alarmed the Mogul, the Portuguese and the Dutch, and brought hostilities upon the English, which the pusillanimous James would not allow them to punish as justice required. But it was not two months together in the mind, nor was it in the power of the tyrant of Persia to give any effectual assistance to the English. A Persian boxed Lord Shirley, the Sophi's ambassador, in the presence of James, and each charged the other with imposture. And the king of Persia and his minister did nothing but scruple the credentials sent from England, and endeavour to extort presents. While James thus amused himself with his Perfian negociation, as fagacious and fruitless as those he held with the court of Spain and the Prince Palatine, the commerce of his subjects languished in India. Hopeless of any help from Perfia, they entered into a kind of partnership in some of the Dutch fettlements. But when the Hollander found his opportunity, the English of Amboyna and other places experienced injuries and cruelties, which are yet unatoned, and which for many years rendered them of little or no consequence in the East.

the ports of Goa and Diu in India, and the isle of Macao in the bay of Canton, only remain in the possession of the Portuguese. Two small vessels, often Chinese, once in the year carry some porcelaine to Goa and Diu, but these must touch at Surat and other ports to complete their return of silk and spicery. And one ship, with a poor cargo, according to Histoire Philosophique, partly surnished by the two sloops of Macao, and partly purchased from the English, sails once in the year from Goa for Lisbon. Such is the fall of that power which once commanded the commerce of Africa and Asia from the straits of Gibraltar to the eastern side of Japan.

The author, just now mentioned, in his reslections on the fate of the Portuguese, informs his reader, that while the court of Lisbon projected the discovery of India, and expected inexhaustible riches, the more moderate and enlightened foresaw and foretold the evils which would follow success. And time, fays he, the supreme judge of politics, hastened to fulfill their predictions. He, however, who is acquainted with the Portuguese Historians, must perceive the errors of this misrepresentation. The objections against the voyage of Gama, were by no means of the enlightened kind. They were these: Nothing but barren deserts, like Lybia, were to be found; or, if the discovered lands were rich, the length of the voyage would render it unprofitable; or if profitable, the introduction of wealth would beget a degeneracy of manners fatal to the kingdom. Foreign settlements would produce a depopulation and neglect of agriculture; or if foreign colonies were necessary, Ethiopia offered both nearer and better settlements. And the wrath of the Soldan of Egypt, and a combination of all Europe against Portugal, completed the prophecy of the threatened evils. But it was neither foreseen nor foretold, that the unexampled misconduct of the Portuguese would render the most lucrative commerce of the world an heavy, and at last insupportable expence on the treasury of Lisbon or Madrid; nor was it foretold, that the shameless villainy, the faithless piracies and rapine of their countrymen, would bring down destruction upon their empire. Of the objections here enumerated, few are named by our author. Nor does the evil of the increase of wealth, the depopulation and neglect of agriculture, which he mentions as the confequences of the navigation to India, do honour to the wifdom wisdom of those who foretold them, or to that of those who adopt the opinion. Many have pronounced, that the same evils which overwhelmed the Portuguese, are ready to burst upon the British empire; an enquiry, therefore, into the cause from whence these evils sprung, is of no trivial importance to the British nation.

Mines of gold, though most earnestly desired, are the least valuable parts of foreign acquisition. To encrease the population of the mother country is the only real wealth, and this can only be attained by increasing the means of employment, in fuch manner as will naturally inspire the spirit of industry. The staple commodities of a country must therefore be manufactured at home, and from hence, agriculture will of necessity be improved. To export the domestic manufacture, and import the commodities of foreign countries, are the great, the only real uses of foreign settlements. But did Spain and Portugal derive these advantages from their immense acquisitions in the East and West? Every thing contrary. The gold of Mexico and Peru levied the armics of Charles V. but established or encouraged no trade in his kingdom. Poverty and depopulation, therefore, was not the natural consequence of the discoveries of Columbus, but the certain result of the evil policy of Spain. We have feen how the traffic of India was managed by Portugal. That commerce which was the foundation of the maritime strength of the Mohammedan powers, and which enriched Venice, was not only all in the power of the Portuguese, but it was their's also to purchase that traffic on their own terms with the commodities of Europe. Had these methods been pursued, Portugal, a much finer country, had soon been more populous than Holland is now. He who foretells the neglect of agriculture on the increase of commerce, foretells an event contrary to the nature of things; and nothing but an infatuation, which cannot at a distance be foreseen, may possibly fullfil the prediction. Ignorance of the true principles of commerce, that great cause of the fall of the Portuguese empire, does not at present threaten the British; nor is the only natural reason of that fall applicable to Great Britain. The territory of Portugal is too fmall to be the head of so extensive an empire as once owned its authority. Auxiliaries may occasionally affist, but permanancy of dominion can only be ensured by native troops. The numerous merous garrifons of Portugal in Brazil, in Africa and Afia, required more supplies than the seat of empire could afford without depriving itself of defence in case of invasion. In the event, the foreign garrisons were lost for want of supplies, and the feat of empire, on the shock of one disaster, fell an easy prey to the usurpation of Spain. Great Britain, on the contrary, by the appointment of nature, reigns the commercial empress of the world. The unrivalled island is neither too large nor too fmall. Ten millions of inhabitants are naturally fufficient to afford armies to defend themselves against the greatest power; nor is fuch radical strength liable to fall afunder by its own weight. Neither is nature less kind in the variety of the climate of the British isles. That variety in her different provinces alike contributes to the production of her invaluable staples and hardy troops. Won and defended from the Mohammedans in wars esteemed religious, the circumstances of Portugal, produced a high and ardent spirit of chivalry, which raised her to empire; but when fuccess gave a relaxation to the action of this spirit, the general ignorance of all ranks funk her into ruin. The circumstances of the British empire are greatly different. Her military spirit is neither cherished by, nor dependent upon causes which exist in one age and not in another; and deep, indeed, must be her degeneracy, when all her ranks are as ignorant of her true interest as those of Portugal were, previous to her fall. Nor is the increase of wealth big with such evils as some esteem. Portugal did not owe her fall to it, for she was not enriched by the commerce of India. And if Great Britain ever fuffer by enormous wealth, it must be by a general corruption of manners. This, however, is infinitely more in the power of government than some surmise. To remedy an evil we must trace its source. And never was there national corruption of manners which did not flow from the vices and errors of government. Where merit is the only passport to promotion, corruption of manners cannot be general. Where the worthless can purchase the offices of trust, universal profligacy must follow. It was not the acquisitions given by Columbus, it was the dull ignorant politics of Madrid which rendered America in any degree a curse to Spain. It was not the fall of Carthage that corrupted Rome, it was the want of knowledge and the want of virtue in the Roman Senate which introduced introduced that venality, which, as a hectic fever, confumed the Roman strength. Mankind, it may be said, are liable to be corrupted, and wealth affords the opportunity. But this axiom will greatly mislead us from the line of truth, if taken in a general sense. The middle rank of men is infinitely more virtuous than the lowest. Profligacy of manners is not therefore the natural consequence of affluence, it is the accident which attends a vulgar mind in whatever external situation. And when vulgar minds are preferred to the high offices of church or state, it is the negligence, or wickedness of government, and not the increase of wealth, which is the source of national corruption. Some articles of traffic have an evil influence on a people. But neither is this in justice to be charged on the increase of national trade. The true principles of commerce on the contrary, require the restriction of many *, and perhaps the prohibition of some articles. And ignorance of the true spirit of commerce, and neglect in the legislature, are therefore the only sources of these evils. The ascendency of this ignorance and this neglect, are always attended with venality, and must prove fatal in every country. The two first fatal to the commercial strength, venality to the national power and manners. When the king of Spain commanded Azevedo, his Viceroy of India, to dispose of every office by public sale, he made an edict, that merit should be neglected, and that the most worthless and unfit should only be entrusted with the public affairs. Exactly proportioned to the degrees of venality, as it is checked or predominant, does the constitutional health of every empire recover or decline. That of Portuguese Asia, from the complex variety become a dangerous burden on the common wealth. Nor is all which is fpent by individuals, gained, as some affert, by the public. A young merchant who dissipates 10,000 l. in debauchery among sharpers and courtezans, people of no labour, does not advantage the public in any degree equal to the loss which it sustains in the distresses of his industrious creditors. Nor is even this all; where private luxury is cherished as a public benefit, a national corruption of manners, the most dreadful political disease, will be sure to prevail, sure to reduce the most slourishing kingdom to the most critical weakness.

That private vices, the luxury and extravagance of individuals, are public benefits, has been confidently afferted, yet no theoretical paradox was ever more falfe. Luxuries, indeed, employ many hands, but all hands in employment conduce not alike to the fervice of the state. Those employed on the natural staples are of the first rate fervice; but those engaged on luxuries often require materials which contribute to turn the ballance of trade against the country where they reside; and as the sale of their labours depends upon sashion and caprice, not upon the real wants of life, they are apt to be thrown out of employ, and to displayed,

of causes we have traced, had long struggled in a deep confumption, and was now in the last stage, when Philip II. made an edict in open favour of venality, an act which almost immediately ended her political existence.

If happily many of the causes of the fall of Portugal do not threaten the British empire; yet against those causes last mentioned, Great Britain cannot be too well guarded; and may He who foretells her danger from them, never prove a Cassandra in prophecy; may He never have the gift of foretelling what is true, and yet be fated to obtain no credit!—But if the fall of the Portuguese empire be an example peculiarly held up to the British, still more particularly does the history of Portuguese Asia demand the attention of that stupendous Common Wealth, the United East India Company.

The histories of wars, from the earliest times, are much alike; the names of the countries ravished, the towns destroyed, and captains slain, are different; the motives and conduct of the oppressors, and the miseries of the oppressed, are the same. Portugal raised the first commercial empire of the modern world; the history of her fate therefore opens a new field for the most important speculation. The transactions of the Portuguese in India are peculiarly the wars and negociations of commerce, and therefore offer instructions to every trading country, which are not to be found in the campaigns of a Cæsar or a Marlborough. The prosperity and declension of foreign settlements, refulting from the wisdom or errors of the supreme power at home, from the wisdom or imprudence, the virtues or vices of governors abroad; The stupendous effects of unstained honour and faith; The miserable ruinous embarrassments which attend dishonest policy, though supported by the greatest abilities in the field or in the council; The uncommercial and dreadful consequences of wars unjustly provoked, though crowned with a long feries of victories; The felf-destructive measures, uncommercial spirit and inherent weakness of despotic rule; The power, affluence, and stability which reward the liberal policy of humane government; in a word, All those causes which nourish the infancy, all those which as a secret disease undermine, or as a violent poison suddenly destroy the vital strength of a commercial empire; all these are developed and displayed, in the most exemplary manner, in the history of the transactions of Portuguese Asia.

And all these combine to ascertain the one great principle upon which the British East India Company must exist or fall. The viceroy or governor always finds two interests, often different from each other, foliciting his attention; the public interest and his own private one. If institutions cannot be devised to render it the true interest of governors, to make that of the public their first care, stability cannot be preserved *. - But it were unjust to require the poverty of an Albuquerk or a Nunio. He who devotes his life to the fervice of his country, merits a reward adequate to his station. An estimate of the reward which true policy will give, may be drawn from the fate of the Dutch settlement at Brazil. Prince Maurice of Nassau, the general of a Dutch West India company, expelled the Portuguese from one half of this rich and extensive country. In reward of his fervice he was appointed governor, but his mercantile masters, earnest for immediate gain, and ignorant of what was necessary for future security, were offended at the grandeur in which he lived, the number of fortresses which he built, and the expence of the troops which he kept. They forced him by ill treatment to resign, and the ideas of the compting-house were now adopted. The expence of troops and of fortresses was greatly reduced; even that of the court of justice was retrenched; in their commerce with their new subjects every advantage of the fordid trader was taken, and payment was enforced with the utmost rigour. Cent. per cent. was now divided in Holland, and all was happy in the idea of the Burgo-masters, the Lords of this colony; when the Portuguese, invited by the defenceless state, and joined by the discontented subjects of the Dutch, overwhelmed them with ruin.

merchant is fettered by difficulties, only men of desperate fortune will settle in a distant climate. And these, conscious of the restraints under which they labour, conscious that they have much to gain and little to lose, will, in the nature of things, be solely influenced by the spirit of the mere adventurer; by that spirit which utterly ruined the Portuguese in India.

Nor is it enough to suppress the means of private villainy: To render a settlement prosperous, the honest merchant must have every possible encouragement. If it is easy to acquire an handsome independence in an honourable channel, the sons of men of property and of connexions, will adventure; and where capital and real abilities are best rewarded, commerce must greatly increase. If on the other hand, the

Though the States now interested themselves vigourously, all the great expence of their armaments was lost. Brazil was recovered by the Portuguese, and the Dutch East India Company was utterly extinguished.

Nor can we close our observations without one more. Nunioacquired an extensive territory in India. Harrassed by the horrible wars of their native princes, the regions around Goa implored the Portuguese to take them under protection. And safe and happy, while all around was steeped in blood, the territory under the dominion of Nunio was the envy and wonder of India. Taught by this example, every humane breast must warm on the view of the happiness which the British India Company MAY diffuse over the East, a happiness which the British * are peculiarly enabled to bestow. Besides the many. instances of Portuguese tyranny and misconduct already enumerated, there was a defect in their government which must ever prove fatal to a commercial empire. All the stupendous. efforts of Portuguese colonization were only founded on the fands, on the quick-fands of human caprice and arbitrary power. They governed by no certain system of laws. Their governors carried to India the image of the court of Lisbon, and against the will of the Ruler there was no appeal to the civil power. Confidence in the high justice of a Nunio may give nations habituated to oppression a temporary spirit of industry; but temporary it must be, as a hasty journey made in the uncertains The cheerful vigour of commerce interval of a tempest. can only be uniform and continued where the merchant is conscious of protection on his appeal to known laws of supreme. authority. On the firm basis of her laws the colonies of Great Britain have wonderfully prospered, for she gave them an image of her own constitution. And even where the government of

• The form of the government, and the national character of the British, peculiarly enable them to dissufe the blessings which slow from the true spirit of commerce. The Dutch have a penuriousness in their manners, and a palpable selsishness in their laws, ill relished by the neighbours of their settlements. They want a mixture of the blood of gentlemen; or to drop the metaphor, they want that liberal turn of idea and sentiment which arises from the intercourse and conversation of the merchant with the man of property, educated in independance. India, perhaps the most fertile country in the world, has suffered more by famine than any other. For the thousands who have died of hunger in other countries, India has buried millions of her sons, who have thus perished. Amazingly populous, the failure of a crop of rice is here dreadful. It is the true spirit of commerce to prevent famine, to bring provision from one country to another. And may this true spirit of it be exerted by the British in India!

the natives cannot be new modelled, an easy appeal to the supermacy of her civil laws, must place her commerce upon the surest foundation. It is not the spirit of Gothic conquest, it is not the little cunning sinesse of embroiling the Indian princes among themselves; of cajoling one and winning another; it is not the groveling arts of intrigue, often embarrassed, always shifting, which can give lasting security. An essential decisive predominancy of the justice of laws like the British, can alone secure the prosperity of the most powerful commercial system, or render its existence ADVANTAGEOUS or even SAFE to the seat of Empire.

The next period of the Introduction to the Lusiad requires

The LIFE of the AUTHOR.

HEN the glory of the arms of Portugal had reached its meridian splendor, Nature, as if in pity of the literary rudeness of that nation, produced one great Poet, to record the numberless actions of high spirit performed by his countrymen. Except Osorius, the historians of Portugal are little better than dry journalists. But it is not their inelegance which rendered the poet necessary. It is the peculiar nature of poetry to give a colouring to heroic actions, and to express an indignation against the breaches of honour, in a spirit which at once seizes the heart of the man feeling, and carries with it an instantaneous conviction. The brilliant actions of the Portuguese form the great hinge which opened the door to the most important alteration in the civil history of mankind. And to place these actions in the light and enthusiasm of poetry, that enthusiasm which particularly assimulates the youthful breast to its own fires, was Luis de Camoens, the poet of Portugal, born.

Different cities claimed the honour of his birth. But according to N. Antonio, and Manuel Correa his intimate friend, this event happened at Lisbon in 1517. His family was of considerable note, and originally Spanish. In 1370, Vasco Perez de Caamans, disgusted at the court of Castile, sled to that of Lisbon, where king Ferdinand immediately admitted him into his council, and gave him the lordships of Sardoal, Punnete, Marano, Amendo, and other considerable lands; a certain proof of the eminence of his rank and abilities. In the war for the succession, which broke out on the death of Ferdinand, Caamans, sided with the king of Castile, and was killed in the battle of Aljabarrota. But though John I. the victor, victor, seized a great part of his estate, his widow, the daughter of Gonsalo Tereyro, grand master of the order of Christ, and general of the Portuguele army, was not reduced beneath her rank. She had three fons, who took the name of Camoens, The family of the eldest inter-married with the first nobility of Portugal, and even, according to Castera, with the blood royal. But the family of the second brother, whose fortune was slender. had the superior honour to produce the Author of the Lusiad.

Early in his life the misfortunes of the Poet began. In his infancy, Simon Vaz de Camoens, his father, commander of a vessel, was shipwrecked at Goa, where, with his life, the greatest part of his fortune was lost. His mother, however, Anne de Macedo of Santarene, provided for the education of her fon Luis at the university of Coimbra. What he acquired there his works discover: An intimacy with the classics, equal to that of a Scaliger, but directed by the taste of a Milton or a Pope.

When he left the university he appeared at court. He was handsome *, had speaking eyes, it is said, and the finest complexion. Certain it is, however, he was a polished scholar, which, added to the natural ardour and gay vivacity of his difposition, rendered him an accomplished gentleman. Courts are the scenes of intrigue, and intrigue was fashionable at Lisbon. But the particulars of the amours of Camoens rest unknown. This only appears: He had aspired above his rank, for he was banished from the court; and in several of his sonnets he ascribes this misfortune to love.

He now retired to his mother's friends at Santarene. he renewed his studies, and began his Poem on the Discovery of India. John III. at this time prepared an armament against Africa. Camoens, tired of his inactive obscure life, went to Ceuta in this expedition, and greatly distinguished his valour in several rencounters. In a naval engagement with the Moors in the straits of Gibraltar, in the conflict of boarding he was among the foremost, and lost his right eye. Yet neither the was handsome, and had a most engaging et in fine crassinsculus." mein and address. He is thus described by

The French Translator gives us so fine a Nicolas Antonio, "Medioeri statura fuit, description of the person of Camoens, that it et carne plena, capillis usque ad eroci colorem seems to be borrowed from the Fairy Tales. flavescentibus, maxime in juventute. Emine-It is universally agreed, however, that he bat ei frons, & medius nasus, catera longur, hurry of actual service nor the dissipation of the camp could stifle his genius. He continued his Lusiadas, and several of his most beautiful sonnets were written in Africa, while, as he expresses it,

One hand the pen, and one the fword employ'd.

The fame of his valour had now reached the court, and he obtained permission to return to Lisbon. But while he solicited an establishment which he had merited in the ranks of battle, the malignity of evil tongues, as he calls it in one of his letters, was injuriously poured upon him. Though the bloom of his early youth was effaced by feveral years residence under the scorching heavens of Africa, and though altered by the loss of an eye, his presence gave uneasiness to the gentlemen of some families of the first rank where he had formerly visited. Jealoufy is the characteristic of the Spanish and Portuguese; its refentment knows no bounds, and Camoens now found it prudent to banish himself from his native country. Accordingly, in 1553, he failed for India, with a resolution never to return. 'As the ship left the Tagus he exclaimed, in the words of the fepulchral monument of Scipio Africanus, Ingrata patria, non possidebis ossa mea! Ungrateful country, thou shalt not possess my bones! But he knew not what evils in the East would awake the remembrance of his native fields.

When Camoens arrived in India, an expedition was ready to fail to revenge the king of Cochin on the king of Pimenta. Without any rest on shore after his long voyage, he joined this armament, and in the conquest of the Alagada islands, displayed his usual bravery. But his modesty, perhaps, is his greatest praise. In a sonnet he mentions this expedition: We went to punish the king of Pimenta, says he, e succeeded well. When it is considered that the Poet bore no inconsiderable share in the victory, no ode can conclude more elegantly, more happily than this.

In the year following he attended Manuel de Vasconcello in an expedition to the Red Sea. Here, says Faria, as Camoens had no use for his sword he employed his pen. Nor was his activity confined in the fleet or camp. He visited Mount Felix and the adjacent inhospitable regions of Africa, which he so strongly pictures in the Lusiad, and in one of his little pieces, where he laments the absence of his mistress.

ftrongly

When he returned to Goa he enjoyed a tranquility which enabled him to bestow his attention on his Epic Poem. But this serenity was interrupted, perhaps by his own imprudence. He wrote some satyrs which gave offence, and by order of the Viceroy Francisco Barreto he was banished to China.

Men of dull abilities are more conscious of their embarrassment and errors than is commonly believed. When men of this kind are in power, they affect great solemnity; and every expression of the most distant tendency to lessen their dignity, is held as the greatest of crimes. Conscious also how severely the man of genius can hurt their interest, they bear an instinctive antipathy against him, are uneasy even in his company, and on the slightest pretence are happy to drive him from them. Camoens was thus situated at Goa; and never was there a fairer field for satyr than the rulers of India at this time afforded. Yet whatever esteem the prudence of Camoens may lose in our idea, the nobleness of his disposition will doubly gain. And so conscious was he of his real integrity and innocence, that in one of his sonnets he wishes no other revenge on Barreto, than that the cruelty of his exile should ever be remembered*.

* Castera, who always condemns Camoens as if guilty of sacriledge, when the slightest reproach of a grandee appears, tells us, "that posterity by no means enters into the refentment of our poet, and that the Portuguese historians make glorious mention of Barreto, who was a man of true merit." The Portuguese historians, however, knew not what true merit was. The brutal uncommercial wars of Sampayo are by them mentioned as much more glorious than the less bloody campaigns of a Nunio, which established commerce and empire. But the actions of Barreto shall be called to witness for Camoens.

We have seen Souza's villainous negociation in favour of Meale Can, and the dangerous war which it kindled. Barreto took up the same business, and Meale Can, in breach of the treaty with his brother Hydal Can, was by him proclaimed king of Visipor. This begat a war, which ended in the captivity of Meale Can and the disgrace of the Portuguese, who were stript of the territory and revenues promifed them by the Usurper. In the spirit of Sampayo, Barreto's officers desolated the coasts of Malabar and Ceylon. Because Hydal Can fought revenge for the favour shewed to the Usurper, Barreto sent Coutinho to attack Salfete and Bardes, all the fea ports of which he destroyed with fire and fword, and returned, says Faria, with binour and riches to Goa. Hydal Can on this raised a great army. Barreto did the same; but though he made a winter campaign, did nothing, favs Faria, worthy of history. The king of Cinde desired Barreto's assistance to crush a neighbouring prince who had invaded his dominions. Barreto went himself to relieve him; but having difagreed about the re-ward he required, for the king had made peace with his enemy, he burned Tata the royal city, killed above 8000 of the people he came to protect, for eight days destroyed every thing on the banks of the Indus, and loaded his veffels, fays our author, with the richest booty hitherto taken in India. The The accomplishments and manners of Camoens soon found him friends, though under the disgrace of banishment. He was appointed commissary of the Defunct in the island of Macao, a Portuguese settlement in the bay of Canton. Here he continued his Lusiad; and here also, after five years residence, he acquired a fortune, though small, yet equal to his wishes. Don Constantine de Braganza was now Viceroy of India, and Camoens, defirous to return to Goa, refigned his charge. In a ship, freighted by himself, he set sail, but was shipwrecked in the gulph near the mouth of the river Mehon on the coast of China. All he had acquired was lost in the waves: his poems, which he held in one hand, while he fwimmed with the other, were all he found himself possessed of, when he Rood friendless on the unknown shore. But the natives gave him a most humane reception: this he has immortalised in the prophetic fong in the tenth Lusiad*; and in the seventh, he tells us, that here he lost the wealth which satisfied his wishes.

Agora da esperança ja adquirida, &c.

On the banks of the Mehon, he wrote his beautiful paraphrase of the psalm, where the Jews, in the finest strain of poetry, are represented as hanging their harps on the willows war with Hydal Can, kindled by Barreto's treachery, continued. The city of Dabul was destroyed by the viceroy, who, soon after, at the head of 17,000 men, deseated the injured Hydal Can's army of 20,000. While horrid desolation followed these victories, and while Hydal Can raised new armies, Duarte Deza treacherously imprisoned the king of Ternate and his whole family, though in alliance with Portugal, and ordered them to be starved to death. This kindled a wat, which endangered the Malucos, and ended in the submission of the Portuguese. Such was the monster Barreto, the man who exiled Camoens, and fuch were the villains who acted under him.

* Having named the Mehon;

Este recebera placido, & brando,

No feu regaço o Canto, que molhado, &c. Literally thus: "On his gentle hospitable bosom (fic brando poeticé) shall he receive the song, wet from woeful unhappy ship-wreck, escaped from destroying tempests, from ravenous dangers, the effect of the unjust sentence upon him, whose lyre shall be more renowned than enriched." When Camoens was commissary, he visited the islands of Ternate, Timor, &c. described in the Lustad.

by the rivers of Babylon, and weeping their exile from their native country. Here Camoens continued some time, till an opportunity offered to carry him to Goa. When he arrived at that city, Don Constantine de Braganza, the Viceroy, whose characteristic was politeness, admitted him into intimate friendship, and Camoens was happy till Count Redondo assumed the government. Those who had formerly procured the banishment of the satyrist, were silent while Constantine was in power. But now they exerted all their arts against him. Redondo, when he entered on office, pretended to be the friend of Camoens; yet, with all that unfeeling indifference with which he made his most horrible witticism on the Zamorim, he suffered the innocent man to be thrown into the common prison. After all the delay of bringing witnesses, Camoens, in a public trial, fully refuted every accusation of his conduct, while commissary at Macao, and his enemies were loaded with ignominy and reproach. But Camoens had some creditors; and these detained him in prison a considerable time, till the gentlemen of Goa began to be ashamed, that a man of his fingular merit should experience such treatment among them. He was set at liberty; and again he assumed the profession of arms, and received the allowance of a gentleman volunteer, a character at this time common in Portuguese India. after, Pedro Barreto, appointed governor of the fort at Sofala, by high promises, allured the poet to attend him thither. The governor of a distant fort, in a barbarous country, shares in some measure the fate of an exile. Yet, though the only motive of Barreto was, in this unpleasant situation, to retain the conversation of Camoens at his table, it was his least care to render the life of his guest agreeable. Chagrined with his treatment, and a confiderable time having elapfed in vain dependence upon Barreto, Camoens resolved to return to his native country. A ship, on the homeward voyage, at this time touched at Sofala, and several gentlemen * who were on board were desirous that Camoens should accompany them. But this the governor ungeneroully endeavoured to prevent, and charged him ward voyage, wrote annotations upon the Lusiad, under the eye of its author. But these unhappily have never appeared in public.

^{*} According to the Portuguese Life of Camoens, prefixed to Gedron's, the best edition of his works, Diogo de Couto, the historian, one of the company in this home-with a debt for board. Anthony de Cabral, however, and Hector de Sylveyra, paid the demand, and Camoens, says Faria, and the honour of Barreto, were fold together.

After an absence of sixteen years, Camoens, in 1569, returned to Lisbon, unhappy even in his arrival, for the pestilence then raged in that city, and prevented his publication for three years. At last, in 1572, he printed his Lusiad, which, in the opening of the sirst book, in a most elegant turn of compliment he addressed to his prince, king Sebastian, then in his eighteenth year. The king, says the French translator, was so pleased with his merit, that he gave the Author a pension of 4000 reals, on condition that he should reside at court. But this salary, says the same writer, was withdrawn by Cardinal Henry, who succeeded to the crown of Portugal, lost by Sebastian at the battle of Alcazar.

But this story of the pension is very doubtful. Correa, and other cotemporary authors, do not mention it, though some late writers have given credit to it. If Camoens, however, had a pension, it is highly probable that Henry deprived him of it. While Sebastian was devoted to the chace, his grand uncle, the Cardinal, prefided at the council board, and Camoens, in his address to the king, which closes the Lusiad, advises him to exclude the clergy from state affairs. It was easy to see that the Cardinal was here intended. And Henry, besides, was one of those statesmen who can perceive no benefit resulting to the public from elegant literature. But it ought also to be added in completion of his character, that under the narrow views and weak hands of this Henry, the kingdom of Portugal fell into utter ruin; and on his death, which closed a short inglorious reign, the crown of Lisbon, after a faint struggle, was annexed to that of Madrid. Such was the degeneracy of the Portuguese, a degeneracy lamented in vain by Camoens, and whose observation of it was imputed to him as a crime.

Though the great * patron of one species of literature, a fee the note, p. 456.) He corresponded with them, directed their labours, and received the first accounts of their success. Under his patronage it was discovered, that St. Thomas ordered the Indians to worship the Cross; and that the Moorish tradition of Perimal, (who, having embraced Mohammedism, ^{*} Cardinal Henry's patronage of learning and learned men is mentioned with cordial efteem by the Portuguese writers. Happily they also tell us what that learning was. It was to him the Romish Friars of the East transmitted their childish forgeries of inscriptions and miracles (for Jone of aubich, species the reverse of that of Camoens, certain it is, that the author of the Lusiad was utterly neglected by Henry, under whose inglorious reign he died in all the misery of poverty. By some, it is said, he died in an alms-house. It appears, however, that he had not even the certainty of subsistence, which these houses provide. He had a black servant, who had grown old with him, and who had long experienced his mafter's humanity. This grateful Indian, a native of Java, who, according to some writers, faved his master's life in the unhappy shipwreck where he lost his effects, begged in the streets of Lisbon for the only man in Portugal on whom God had bestowed those talents, which have a tendency to crect the spirit of a downward age. To the eye of a careful observer, the fate of Camoens throws great light on that of his country, and will appear strictly connected with it. The same ignorance, the same degenerated spirit, which suffered Camoens to depend on his share of the alms begged in the streets by his old hoary fervant, the same spirit which caused this, sunk the kingdom of Portugal into the most abject vasfallage ever experienced by a conquered nation. While the grandees of Portugal were blind to the ruin Mohammedism, divided his kingdom among his officers, whom he rendered tributary to the Zamorim,) was a malicious misrepre-Sentation, for that Perimal, having turned Christian, refigned his kingdom and became a monk. Such was the learning patronised by Henry, under whose auspices, that horrid tribunal, the inquisition was crected at Lisbon. And he himself long presided as inquisitor general. Nor was he content with this, he established an inquisition also at Goa, and fent a whole apparatus of holy fathers to form a court of inquisitors, to suppress the lews and reduce the native Christians to the See of Rome. Nor must the treatment experienced by Buchanan at Lisbon be here omitted, as it affords a convincing proof that the fine genius of Camoens, was the true fource of his misfortunes. John III. earnest to promote the cultivation of polite literature among his subjects, engaged Buchanan, the most elegant Latinist, perhaps, of modern times, to teach philosophy and the Belles Lettres at Lisbon. But the design of the monarch was foon frustrated by the clergy, at the head of whom was Henry, afterwards the fovereign. Buchanan was committed to prison, because it was alledged he had eaten flesh in Lent, and because in his early youth, at St. Andrews in Scotland, he had written a fatyr against the Franciscans; for which, however, ere he would venture to Lisbon, John had promised ab-solute indemnity. John, with much disticulty, procured his release from a loathsome jail, but could not effect his restoration as a teacher. No, he only changed his prison, for Buchanan was sent to a monastery to be instructed by the monks, the men of letters patronised by Henry. These are thus characterised by their pupil Buchanan,-nec inbumanis, nec malis. Jed omnis religionis ignaris. "Not uncivilized, not flagitious, but ignorant of every religion." A fatyrical negative compliment, followed by a charge of gross barbarism. In this confinement Buchanan wrote his elegant version of the psalms. Camoens, about the same time, sailed for India. The blessed effects of the spirit which persecuted such men, are well expressed in the proverb, A Spaniard, stript of all his virtues, makes a good Portuguese.

which impended over them, Camoens beheld it with a pungency of grief which hastened his exit. In one of his letters he has these remarkable words, "Em sim accaberey à vida, e verràm todos que suy aseiçoada a minho patria, &c." I am ending the course of my life, the world will witness how I have loved my country. I have returned, not only to die in her bosom, but to die with her." In another letter, written a little before his death, he thus, yet with dignity, complains, "Who has seen on so small a theatre as my poor bed, such a representation of the disappointments of fortune. And I, as if she could not herself subdue me, I have yielded and become of her party; for it were wild audacity to hope to surmount such accumulated evils."

In this unhappy situation, in 1579, in his sixty-second year, the year after the satal defeat of Don Sebastian, died Luis de Camoens, the greatest literary genius ever produced by Portugal; in martial courage and spirit of honour, nothing inserior to her greatest heroes. And in a manner suitable to the poverty in which he died was he buried. Soon after, however, many epitaphs honoured his memory; the greatness of his merit was universally confessed, and his Lusiad was translated into various languages*. Nor ought it to be omitted, that the man so miserably neglected by the weak king Henry, was earnestly enquired after by Philip of Spain, when he assumed the crown of Lisbon. When Philip heard that Camoens was dead, both his words and his countenance expressed his disappointment and grief.

From the whole tenor of his life, and from that spirit which glows throughout the Lusiad, it evidently appears that the courage and manners of Camoens flowed from true greatness and dignity of soul. Though his polished conversation ‡ was often courted ted also into Hebrew with great elegance and spirit by one Luzzetto, a learned and ingenious Jew, author of several poems in that language, and who, about thirty years ago, died in the Holy Land.

^{*} According to Gedron, a fecond edition of the Lusiad appeared in the same year with the first. There are two Italian and sour Spanish translations of it. An hundred years before Castera's version it appeared in French. Thomas de Faria, Bp. of Targa in Africa, translated it into Latin, and printed it without either his own or the name of Camoons: a mean but vain attempt to pass his version upon the public as an original. Le P. Niceron says there were two other Latin translations. It is transla-

t Camoens has not escaped the fate of other eminent wits. Their ignorant admirers contrive anecdotes of their humour, which in reality disgrace them. Camoens, it is said, one day heard a potter singing some of his verses in a miserable mangled manner, and by way of retaliation, broke a parcel by the great, he appears so distant from servility, that his imprudence in this respect is by some highly blamed. Yet the instances of it by no means deferve that severity of censure with which some writers have condemned him. Unconscious of the feelings of a Camoens, they knew not that a carelessness in securing the smiles of fortune, and an open honesty of indignation, are almost inseparable from the enthusiasm of fine imagination. The truth' is, the man possessed of true genius feels his greatest happiness in the pursuits and excursions of the mind, and therefore makes an estimate of things, very different from that of him whose unremitting attention is devoted to his external interest. The profusion of Camoens is also censured. Had he dissipated the wealth he acquired at Macao, his profusion indeed had been criminal; but it does not appear that he ever enjoyed any other; opportunity of acquiring independence. But Camoens was unfortunate, and the unfortunate man is viewed

Through the dim shade his fate casts o'er him:

A shade that spreads its evening darkness o'er

His brightest virtues, while it shews his foibles.

Crowding and obvious as the midnight stars,

Which in the sunshine of prosperity

Never had been descried——

Yet after the strictest discussion, when all the causes are weighed together, the missortunes of Camoons will appear the fault and disgrace of his age and country, and not of the man. His talents would have secured him an apartment in the palace of Augustus, but such talents are a curse to their possessor in any illiterate nation. After all, however, if he was imprudent on his first appearance at the court of John III. if the honesty of his indignation led him into great imprudence, as certainly it did, when at Goa he satyrised the Viceroy and the first Goths a parcel of his earthen ware. "Friend, faid he, you destroy my verses and I destroy your goods." The same foolish story is told of Ariosto; nay, we are even informed, that Rinaldo's speech to his horse in the first book,

Ferma Baiardo mio, &c. was the passage missured; and that on the potter's complaint, the injured poet replied,

"I have only broken a few base pots of thine not worth a groat, but thou hast murdered a fine stanza of mine worth a mark of gold." But both these silly tales are borrowed from Plutarch's life of Arcesilaus, where the same dull humour is told of Philoxenus. "He heard some brick-makers missure one of his songs, and in return he destroyed a number of their bricks."

in power; yet let it also be remembered, that "The gifts of " imagination bring the heaviest task upon the vigilance of reason; and to bear those faculties with unerring rectitude or invariable propriety, requires a degree of firmness and of cool " attention, which doth not always attend the higher gifts of " the mind. Yet difficult as nature herself seems to have rendered the task of regularity to genius, it is the supreme confolation of dullness and of folly to point with Gothic triumph to those excesses which are the overflowings of faculties they never enjoyed. Perfectly unconscious that they are indebted to their stupidity for the consistency of their conduct, they of plume themselves on an imaginary virtue, which has its origin in what is really their disgrace.—Let such, if such "dare approach the shrine of Camoens, withdraw to a respect-" ful distance; and should they behold the ruins of genius, or " the weakness of an exalted mind, let them be taught to lae ment, that nature has left the noblest of her works im-" perfect *."

And Poetry is not only the noblest, but also not the least useful, if civilization of manners be of advantage to mankind. No moral truth may be more certainly demonstrated, than that a Virgil or a Milton are not only the first ornaments of a state, but also of the first consequence if the last refinement of the mental powers be of importance. Strange as this might appear to a ‡ Burleigh or a Locke, it is philosophically accounted for by Bacon; nor is

This paffage in inverted commas is cited, with the alteration of the name only, from Langhorne's account of the life of William Collins.

† Burleigh, though a deep politician in state intrigue, had no idea, that to introduce polite literature into the vernacular tongue, was of any benefit to a nation, though her vernacular literature was the glory of Rome when at the height of empire, and though empire fell with its declension. Spenser, the man who greatly conduced to refine the English Muses, was by Burleigh esteemed a ballad-maker, unworthy of regard. Yet the English polite literature is at this day, in the esteem which it commands abroad, is of more real service to England, than all the reputation or intrigues of Burleigh. And ten thousand Burleighs, according to Sir W. Temple, are born for one Spenser. Ten thousand are born, says Sir William, with abilities requisite to form a great Statesman, for one who is born with the talents or genius of a great Poet. Locke's ideas of poetry are accounted for in one short sentence; He knew nothing about the matter. An extract from his correspondence with Mr. Molyneux, and a citation from one of his treatises, shall demonstrate the truth of this assertion.

Molyneux writes to Locke:

"Mr. Churchill favoured me with the present of Sir R. Blackmore's K. Arthur. I had read Pr. Arthur before, and read it with admiration, which is not at all lessened by this second piece. All our English poets (except Milton) bave been mere ballad-makers in comparison to him. Upon the publication of his sirst poem, I intimated to him, through Locke's opinion either inexplicable, or irrefutable. The great genius of Aristotle, and that of his great resembler, Sir Francis

Mr. Churchill's hands, how excellently I thought he might perform a philosophic poem, from many touches he gave in his Pr. Arthur, particularly from Mopas's song. And I perceive by his preface to K. Arthur he has had the like intimations from others, but rejects them as being an enemy to all philosophic hypotheses."

Mr. Locke answers:

"I shall, when I see Sir R. Blackmore, discourse him as you defire. There is, I with pleasure find, a strange harmony throughout, between your thoughts and mine."

Molyneux replies;

" I perceive you are so happy as to be acquainted with Sir Rich. Blackmore; he is an extraordinary person, and I admire his two prefaces as much as I do any parts of his books: The first, wherein he exposes "the licentiousness and immorality of our late poetry" is incomparable, and the second, wherein he prosecutes the same subject, and delivers his thoughts concerning hypotheses, is no less judicious, and I am wholly of his opinion relating to the latter. However the history and phænomena of nature we may venture at; and this is what I propose to be the subject of a philosophic poem. Sir R. Blackmore has exquisite touches of this kind, dispersed in many places of his books: (to pass over Mopas's fong) I'll instance one particular in the most profound speculations of Mr. Newton's philosophy, thus curiously touched in King Arthur, Book IX. p. 243-

The constellations shine at his command; He form'd their radiant orbs, and with his hand He weigh'd, and put them off with such a force As might preserve an everlasting course.

"I doubt not but Sir R. Blackmore, in these lines, had a regard to the proportionment of the projective motion of the vis centripeta, that keeps the planets in their continued courses.

"I have by me some observations, made by a judicious friend of mine on both of Sir R. Blackmore's poems. If they may be any ways acceptible to Sir R. I shall fend them to you."

Mr. Locke again replies;

"Though Sir R. B's vein in poetry be what every body must allow him to have an extraordinary talent in, and though, with you, I exceedingly valued his first presace, yet I must own to you, there was nothing that I so much admired him for, as for what he says of hypotheses in his last. It seems to me so right, and is yet so much out of the way of the ordinary writers, and practitioners in that faculty, that it shews as great a strength and penetration of judgment as his poetry has shewn slights of fancy."

As the best comment on this, let an extract from Locke's Essay on Education fully explain his ideas.

"If he have a poetic vein; 'tis to me the strangest thing in the world, that the father should desire or suffer it to be cherished or improved. Methinks the parents should labour to have it stifled and suppressed asmuch as may be, and I know not what reafon a father can have to wish his son a poet, who does not defire to have him bid defiance to all other callings or business, which is not yet the worst of the case; for if he proves a fuccessful rhymer, and gets once the reputation of a wit, I defire it may be confidered, what company and places he is like to spend his time in, nay, and estate too; for it is very feldom feen that any one discoversmines of gold or filver in Parnassus. a pleasant air but a barren soil, and there: are very few instances of those who have added to their patrimony by any thing they have reaped from thence. Poetry and Gaming, which usually go together, are alike in this too, that they feldom bring any advantage but to those who have no-thing else to live on. Men of estates almost constantly go away losers, and 'tis well if they escape at a cheaper rate, than their whole estates or the greatest part of them. If therefore you would not have your fon the fiddle to every jovial company, without whom the sparks could not relish their wine, nor know how to spend an afternoon idly; if you would not have him waste his time

These lines, however, are a dull wretched paraphrase of some parts of the Psalms.

Bacon, saw deeper into the true spirit of poetry and the human affections than a Burleigh. In ancient Greece, the works of Homer were called the lesson or philosophy of kings; and Bacon describes the effects of poetry in the most exalted terms. What is deficient of perfection in history and nature poetry supplies; it thus erects the mind, and confers magnanimity, morality, and delight; "and therefore, says he, it was ever thought to have some participation of divineness*." The love of poetry is so and estate to divert others, and condemn the dirty acres left him by his ancestors, I do not think you will much care he should be a poet."

This ignorance of poetry is even worse than the Dutch idea of it. But this, and his opinion of Blackmore fully prove, that Locke, however great in other respects, knew no difference between a Shakespeare, that unequalled philosopher of the passions, and the dullest Grub-street plodder; Between a Milton and the tavern rhymers of the days of the fecond Charles. But Milton's knowledge of the affections discovered in the civilization of the Muses a use of the first importance. A taste formed by the great poetry he esteems as the ultimate refinement of the understanding. "This, (says he, in his Tractate on the Education of Youth) would make them foon perceive, what despicable creatures our common rhymers and play writers be, and shew them what religious, what glorious and magnificent use might be made of poetry, both in divine and human things. From hence, and not till now, will be the right season of forming them to be able writers and composers in every excellent matter . . . whether they be to speak in parliament or council, honour and attention would be waiting on their lips. There would then also appear in pulpits other visages, other gestures, and fluff otherwise wrought than what we now

* His high idea of poetry is thus philofophically explained by the great Bacon:

"So likewise I finde, some particular writings of an elegant nature, touching some of the affections, as of anger, of comfort, upon adverse accidents, of tendernesse of countenance, and other. But the poets and writers of histories are the best doctors of this knowledge, where we find painted forth with the life, how affections are kindled and incited, and how pacified and refirained: and how againe contained from act and farther degree: how they disclose themselves, how they worke, how they vary, how they gather and fortify, how they are inwrapped one within another, and how they doe fight and encounter one with another, and other the like particularities, amongst the which this last is of special use in moral and civile matters."

Here poetry is ranked with history; in the following its effects on the passions is preferred.

"The use of this fained History (Poetry) hath been to give some shadowe of fatisfaction to the mind of man in those points in which nature doth deny it: the world being in proportion inferior to the foul: By reason whereof there is agreeable to the spirit of man a more ample greatnesse, a more exact goodnesse, and a more absolute variety then can 'be found in the nature of things. Therefore because the events of true history have not that magnitude which fatisfieth the mind of man, Poely fayneth acts and events greater and more heroicall; because true hillory propoundeth the successes and issues of actions not so agreeable to the merits of virtue and vice, therefore Poely faynes them more just in retribution, and more according to revealed Providence; because true History representeth actions and events more ordinary and less interchanged. therefore Poely endueth them with more rarenesse, and more unexpected and alternative variations. So then it appeareth that Poefy ferveth and conferreth to magnanimity, morality, and delectation, and therefore it was ever thought to have some participation of divinenesse, because it doth raise and erect the mind, by submitting the shewes of things to the defires of the mind, whereas reason doth humble and bow the mind unto the nature of things."

natural

natural to the stronger affections, that the most barbarous nations delight in it. And always it is found, that as the rude war fong and eulogy of the dead hero refine, the manners of the age refine also. The history of the stages of poetry is the philosophical history of manners; the only history in which, with certainty, we can behold the true character of past ages. True civilization and a humanised taste of the mental pleasures, are therefore synonimous terms. And most certain it is, where feeling and affection reside in the breast, these must be most forcibly kindled and called into action by the animated reprefentations and living fire of the great poetry. Nor may Milton's evidence be rejected, for though a poet himself, his judgment is founded on nature. According to him, a true tafte for the great poetry gives a refinement and energy to all other studies, and is of the last importance in forming the senator and the gentleman. That the poetry of Camoens merits this high character in a fingular manner, he that reads it with taste and attention must own: A Dissertation on it, however, is the duty of the Translator ----

But this must be introduced by an examination of the criticism of Voltaire, a criticism which, though most amazingly erroneous, is generally esteemed in several countries of Europe as the true character of the Lusiad.

When Voltaire was in England, previous to his publication of his Henriade, he published in English an Essay on the Epic Poetry of the European nations. In this he highly praised and severely attacked the Lusiad. In his French editions of this Essay, he has made various alterations at different times in the article of Camoens. The original English, however, shall be here cited, and the French alterations attended to as they occur. Nor is it improper to premise, that some most amazing falsities will be detected; the gross misrepresentation of every objection resuted; and demonstration brought, that when Voltaire wrote his English Essay, his knowledge of the Lusiad was entirely borrowed from the bald, harsh, unpoetical version of Fanshaw.

"While Trissino, says Voltaire, was clearing away the rubbish in Italy, which barbarity and ignorance had heap'd up for ten centuries, in the way of the arts and sciences, Camouens in Portugal steer'd a new course, and acquir'd a reputation which lasts still among his countrymen, who pay as much respect to his memory, as the English to Milton.

"He was a strong instance of the irresistible impulse of nature, which determines a true genius to follow the bent of his talents, in spight of all the obstacles which could check his course.

"His infancy lost amidst the idleness and ignorance of the court of Lisbon; his youth spent in romantic loves, or in the war against the Moors; his long voyages at sea, in his riper years; his misfortunes at court, the revolutions of his country, none of all these could suppress his genius.

Emanuel the fecond king of Portugal, having a mind to find a new way to the East Indies by the ocean, sent Velasco de Gama with a sleet in the year 1497, to that undertaking, which being new, was accounted rash and impracticable, and which of course gained him a great reputation when it succeeded.

"Camouens follow'd Velasco de Gama in that dangerous voyage, led by his friendship to him, and by a noble curiosity, which seldom fails to be the character of men born with a great imagination.

"He took his voyage for the subject of his poem; he enjoy'd the sensible pleasure, which nobody had known before him, to celebrate his friend, and the things he was an eye witness of.

"He wrote his Poem, part on the Atlantic Sea, and part on the Indian shore. I ought not to omit, that in a shipwrack on the coasts of Malabar, he swam a shore, holding-up his poem in one hand, which otherwise had been perhaps lost for ever.

"Such a new subject, manag'd by an uncommon genius, could not but produce a fort of Epic Poetry unheard of before. There no bloody wars are fought, no heroes wounded in a thousand different ways; no woman enticed away, and the world over-turn'd for her cause; no empire founded; in short, nothing of what was deem'd before the only subject of poetry.

"The Poet conducts the Portuguese fleet to the mouth of the Ganges, round the coasts of Africk. He takes notice in the way, of many nations who live upon the African shore. He interweaves artfully the history of Portugal. The simplicity of his subject, is rais'd by some sictions of different kinds, which I think not improper to acquaint the Reader with.

"When the fleet is sailing in the sight of the Cape of Good Hope, call'd then the Cape of the Storms, a formidable shape appears to them, walking in the depth of the sea; his head reaches to the clouds, the storms, the winds, the thunders, and the lightnings hang about him; his arms are extended over the waves. 'Tis the guardian of that foreign ocean unplow'd before by any ship. He complains of being oblig'd to submit to fate, and to the audacious undertaking of the Portuguefe, and foretells them all the misfortunes which they must undergo in the Indies. I believe, that such a fiction would be thought noble and proper, in all ages, and in all nations.

"There is another, which perhaps would have pleas'd the Italians as well as the Portuguese, but no other nation besides: It is the inchanted island, call'd the Island of Bliss, which the fleet finds in her way home, just rising from the sea, for their comfort and for their reward: Camouens describes that place, as Tasso did some years after, his island of Armida. There a supernatural power, brings in all the beauties, and prefents all the pleasures which nature can afford, and which the heart may wish for; a Goddess enamour'd with Velasco de Gama, carries him to the top of an high mountain, from whence she shews him all the kingdoms of the earth, and foretells the fate of Portugal.

"After Camouens hath given loose to his fancy, in the lascivious description of the pleasures which Gama and his crew enjoy'd in the island, he takes care to inform the Reader, that he ought to understand by this fiction, nothing but the satisfaction which the virtuous man feels, and the glory which accrues to him by the practice of virtue; but the best excuse for fuch an invention, is, the charming stile in which it is deliver'd (if we believe the Portuguese) for the beauty of the elocution makes fometimes amends for the faults of the poets, as the colouring of Rubens make some defects in his figures pass unreguarded.

"There is another kind of machinery continued throughout all the Poem, which nothing can excuse, in any country whatever; 'tis an unjudicious mixture of the Heathen Gods with our Religion. Gama in a storm addresses his prayers to Christ, but 'tis Venus who comes to his relief; the heroes are christians, and the poet heathen. The main design which the Portuguese are suppos'd to have (next to promoting their trade) is to propagate Christianity; yet Jupiter, Bacchus, and Venus, have in their hands, all the management of the voyage. So incongruous a machinery, casts a blemish r 2 a blemish upon the whole Poem; yet shews at the same time, how prevailing are its beauties, since the Portuguese like it with all its faults.

of false; his imagination hurries him into great absurdities. I remember, that after Velasco de Gama, hath related his adventures to the king of Melinda, now, says he, O king, judge if Ulysses, and Æneas, have travell'd so far, and undergone so many hardships. As if that barbarous African was acquainted with Homer and Virgil.

"His poem, in my opinion, is full of numberless faults and beauties, thick sown near one another; and almost in every page, there is something to laugh at, and something to be delighted with. Among his most lucky thoughts, I must take notice of two for the likeness, which they bear to two most celebrated passages of Waller, and Sir John Denham.

"Waller says, in his Epistle to Zelinda;

Thy matchless form will credit bring, To all the wonders I can sing.

"Camouens fays, in speaking of the voyages of the Argonautes, and of Ulysses, that the undertaking of the Portuguese shall give credit to all those fables, in surpassing them.

"Sir John Denham, in his Poem on Cooper's-Hill, fays to the Thames;

O could I flow like thee, and make thy stream, My great example, as it is my theme; Tho' deep, yet clear, tho' gentle, yet not dull, Strong without rage, without o'erflowing full.

"Camouens addresses the Nymphs of Tagus in the like manner; "O Nymphs, if ever I sung of you, inspire me now with new and strong lays; let my style flow like your waves; let it be deep and clear, as your waters, &c."

Such is the original criticism of Voltaire on the Lusiad. And never, perhaps, was there such a random reverie, such a mass of misrepresentations and falsities as the whole of it exhibits. The most excuseable parts of it are superficial in the highest degree.

degree. Both the poet and the hero are misnamed by him. The name of the hero has been corrected, that of Camouens remains still in Voltaire, the only author who ever spelled it in this manner. There never was an Emmanuel the second of Portugal. Camoens was not shipwrecked on the coast of Malabar, but on the river Mehon in China. "That Gama went a new way to the East Indies by the ocean," though corrected in the edition of 1768, affords a most striking proof of Voltaire's very careless perusal of the Lusiad at the time when he first presumed to condemn it. For it is often repeated in the poem, that there was no way to India by the ocean before. That the infancy of Camoens was lost amidst the idleness and ignorance of the court of Lisbon, is certainly false. His youth could not have been spent in idleness or ignorance, for his works display a most masterly accuracy in every branch of ancient literature.

Though Voltaire has corrected his error in fending Camoens to the East Indies along with Gama, such an original unparalled romance ought to be recorded. Gama sailed on the discovery of India in 1497. Camoens was born in 1517, and was not seven years of age when Gama died. These facts were immediately objected to Voltaire, but, at first, he would not yield. Contrary to the testimony of Camoens himself, and every circumstance of his life, an * hypothesis must defend this favourite supposition. In his Amsterdam edition of 1738, Voltaire boldly asserts that Camoens was a Spaniard, born in the reign of Ferdinand and Isabel, that he came to Lisbon in the first year of Emmanuel, and was in intimate friendship with Gama,

This bonest hypothesis which makes Camoens a Spaniard, is of a piece with another of the same ingenious Author. In his unhappy Essay on Epic Poetry he afferted, that Milton built his Paradife Lost upon an Italian Comedy, written by one Andreino. This was immediately denied, and even some Italian Literati declared, that no fuch Author or Comedy was known in Italy. Voltaire, however, would not yield, and very gravely he tells the reader, " Il n'est pas etonnant-it is not at all astonishing, that having carefully searched in England for whatever related to that great man (Milton) I should discover circumstances of his life, of which the public were ignorant."—This, therefore, is the authority from which we are to believe that Milton borrowed his Paradise Lost from a Comedy which nobody ever saw. From the same researches in England, Voltaire also learned other circumstances, of which the public were totally ignorant. The writing by which Milton sold his Paradise Lost to one Simmonds, a Bookfeller, is still extant. But Voltaire discovered that he sold it to Tompson for thirty pistoles, "ensin Tompson lui donna trente pistoles de cet ouvrage. Lord Sommers and Dr. Atterbury, he adds, resolving that England should have an Epic Poem, prevailed on the heirs of Tompson to print a splendid edition of it. And Addison wrote, says he, and the English were persuaded, that they had an Epic Poem."

whom he accompanied in his first voyage. Certain it is, however, by the archives of Portugal, that Camoens was in India about seventy-two years after this voyage, and that, according to this hypothesis of Voltaire, he must have been near an hundred years old when he published his Lusiad. Voltaire, however, at last, confesses that Camoens did not accompany Gama. Yet such is his accuracy, that even in the edition of 1768, in an essay which he calls Idée de la Henriade, a sew pages before this confession, the old affertion is still retained. "Le Camoüens, qui est le Virgile de Portugais a celebré un événement dont il avait été temoin lui-même. Camouens, the Portuguese Virgil, has celebrated an event of which he himself had been witness."

No anecdotes ever threw more light upon a character than these throw upon that of Voltaire. The affertion that the Epic Poet enjoyed the sensible pleasure, which nobody had known before bim, to celebrate his friend and the things he was an eye witness of, can only be accounted for by the supposition, that Voltaire was pleased with the idea, and in a little while mistook his strong impression for the remembrance of a fact. The laboured absurd hypothesis, which would defend this fanciful error, cannot be placed in fo fair a light. And the error confessed, and still retained, is a true Voltairism. Yet the idea of his accuracy which these accounts of the Poet must inspire, will even be heightened by the examination of his criticism on the poem. The narrative of a voyage constitutes the Odyssey; the half of the Eneid, and forms the body of the Lusiad. Yet the Lusiad, says Voltaire, contains nothing of what was deemed before the only subject of poetry. It forms, indeed, a fort of Epic poetry unheard of before: But Voltaire's objection to this points out its true praise. No beroes, says he, are wounded a thousand different ways, no woman enticed away and the world overturned for ber cause-And must the fate of Helen, and the thousand different wounds described by Homer, be copied by every Epic Poet? If this fentence has any meaning this is included. Yet what is this puerility of criticism in comparison of Voltaire's affertions, that in the Lufiad no bloody wars are fought, no empire founded .- If the destruction of Troy be allowed to be in the Eneid, there are wars enough in the poem of Camoens. The effect of fire-arms on people who never before beheld these dreadful engines, and ahostile town burnt by a steet, are finely described described in that part which is called the action of the Epic Poem. But Voltaire was as utter a stranger to the first book of the Lusiad, as to the ONE subject of the poem, The founding of the Portuguese empire in the East.—No battle fought, no empire founded! What infult to the literary world is this! A late correction will never disprove his ignorance when he wrote this. Should a pretended critic on Virgil tell his reader that the poet conducted Eneas to the mouth of the Thames, could we believe he was acquainted with his Author? Yet Voltaire tells us, that Camoens conducts the Portuguese fleet to the mouth of the Ganges round the coasts of Afric. - Camoens, indeed, conducts his fleet to Calicut on the coast of Malabar. But though the scene of the action of the four last books lie upon this coast, Voltaire was not happy enough to dip into any of the numerous passages which fix the geography. He has therefore given the voyage of Gama a dimension almost as much beyond the real one given by Camoens, as the West Indies are distant from England. Such errors are convincing proofs that Voltaire only dipt here and there into the Lusiad, even after the critics set him right in some places; for this gross error is still retained. But a misrepresentation, not founded on ignorance, now offers itself. Gama, in a storm, says Voltaire, addresses his prayers to Christ, but 'tis Venus who comes to his relief .- A bold affertion still also retained, but there is no such passage in the Lusiad. Gama, in a tempest, prays to the holy Power, to whom nothing is impossible, the sovereign of earth, sea, and land, who led Israel through the waves, who delivered Paul, and who protected the children of the second father of the world from the deluge. But Christ is not once mentioned in the whole passage: To say that Gama was a good Catholic, and intended Christ under these appellations, is unworthy of poetical criticism, where the whole ridicule consists in the opposition of the name of Christ and Venus. Such is the candour of Voltaire! Nor is it difficult to trace the source of this unfair representation. Fanshaw thus translates the mention of Paul,

Thou who didst keep and save thy fervant Paul-

Monsieur Voltaire wanted no more. Thy servant Paul was to him enough to vindicate the ridicule he chused to bestow. But unhappily for the misguided critic, the original says only, Tu que livraste Paulo *— thou who deliveredst Paul. — And thus * See Lusiadas, Cant. VI. St. 81.

we are furnished with a sure hint of the medium by which our critic studied the Lusiad. To this last unblushing falsity, that Gama prays to Christ, is added, in the edition of 1768, "Bacchus & la Vierge Marie se trouveront tout naturellement ensemble. Bacchus and the Virgin Mary are very naturally found together." If words have meaning, this informs the reader, that they are found together in the Lusiad. Yet the truth is, in the whole poem there is no fuch personage as the Virgin Mary.

After these gross falsities, Voltaire adds, " A parler serieusement, un merveilleux si absurde, desiguré tout l'ouvrage aux yeux de lecteurs sensés, - To speak seriously, such an absurdity in the marvellous, disfigures the whole work in the eyes of the fensible readers."-To such as take Voltaire's word for it, it must indeed feem disfigured; but what literary murder is this! Nor does it end here. A fimilie must enforce the shameless misrepresentation, " It is like the works of Paul Veronese, who has placed Benedictine fathers and Swifs soldiers among his paintings from the Old Testament." And to this also is added, Le Camouens tombe presque toujours dans de telles disparates. Camouens almost continually falls into such extravagancies." Yet with equal justice may this sentence be applied to Virgil; and peculiarly unhappy is the inflance which Voltaire immediately gives: " I remember, fays he, Vasco de Gama says to the king of Melinda, O king, judge if Ulysses and Eneas have travelled so far, and undergone so many bardships: as if that barbarous African was acquainted with Homer and Virgil." This sentence is still retained in Voltaire's last edition of his works. But, according to history, the Melindians were a humane and polished people; their buildings elegant, and in the manner of Spain. The royal family and grandees were Mohammedan Arabs, descended of those tribes, whose learning, when it suits his purpose, is the boast of Voltaire. The prince of Melinda, with whom Gama conversed, is thus described by the excellent historian Osorius: .. In omni autem sermone princeps ille non hominis barbari specimen dabat, sed ingenium et prudentiam eo loco dignam præ se ferebat-In the whole conversation the Prince betrayed no fign of the barbarian; on the contrary, he carried himself with a politeness and intelligence worthy of his rank."-It is also certain, that this Prince, whom Voltaire is pleased to call a barbarous African, had fufficient opportunity to be acquainted with Homer, for for the writings of Homer are translated into the Syriac, in a dialect of which the interpreters of Gama talked with the prince of Melinda 1.

The Lufiad, in my opinion, fays Voltaire, is full of numberless faults and beauties, thick fown near one another, and almost in every page there is something to laugh at, and something to be delighted with." This sentence, though omitted in the French editions, had some source, and that source we shall easily trace. Nor is the character of the king of Melinda fo grossly falfified by Voltaire, as the character of the Lufiad of Camoens is here misrepresented. Except the polite repartee of Veloso (of which fee p. 203.) there are not above two or three passages in the whole poem which even border upon conceit. The most uniform simplicity of manly diction is the true character of the Portuguese Lufiad: Where then did Voltaire find the false wit, and something to laugh at almost in every page? If there be a translation which strictly deserves this character, we cannot suppose that Voltaire hit this character, and at the same time was fo wide of the original, merely by chance. No, he dipt into Fanshaw's Lusiad, where, in every page, there are puns, conceits, and low quaint expressions, uncountenanced by the original. Some citations from Fanshaw will soon justify this assertion. Yet, however decisive this proof may be, it is not the only one. The resemblance found by Voltaire between Sir John Denham's address to the Thames, and that of Camoens to the nymphs of the Tagus, does not exist in the original. Let my stile flow like your waves, let it be deep and clear as your waters

† The Arabs have not only innumerable volumes of their own, but their language is also enriched with translations of several Greek writers. The fate of Euclid is well known. And to mention only two of their authors, Ben-Shohna, who died in 1478, a little before the arrival of Gama, wrote an universal history, which he calls Rawdhat almenadhir si ilm alawail awalawachir; that is, The meadow of the Eye of ancient and modern knowledge. And Abul Pharajius, who lived in the thirteenth century, wrote an history in Arabic, in ten chapters, the first of which treats of the Patriarchs from Adam to Moses; the second of the Judges and Kings of Israel; the third of the Jewish

Kings; the fourth of the Kings of Chaldea; the fifth of the Kings of the Magi; the fixth of the ancient Pagan Greeks; the seventh of the Romans; the eighth of the Constantinopolitan Emperors; the ninth of the Arabian Mohammedan Kings; and the tenth of the Moguls. The fame author acquaints us that Homer's two works are elegantly tranflated into the Syriae; which language is fifter to that spoken by the Arabs of Melinda. Camoens, who was in the country, knew the learning of the Arabians. Voltaire, led by the defire to condemn, was hurried into abfurdities, from which a moment's confideration would have preferved him.

—contains indeed the same allusion as that expressed in the lines cited by Voltaire from Denham. But no such idea or allusion exists in the Portuguese. Though Voltaire still retains this sentence, its unauthenticity has been detected by several critics. But it was left for the present Translator to discover the source of this wide mistranslation. He suspected the allusion might be in Fanshaw, and in Fanshaw he sound it. The nymphs of the Tagus are in Sir Richard's version thus addressed:

If I in low, yet tuneful verse, the praise Of your sweet river always did proclaim, Inspire me now with high and thundering lays, Give me them clear and flowing like his stream.

He who has read Camoens and Fanshaw, will be convinced where Voltaire found the fomething to laugh at in every page. He who has read neither the original northat translation, will now perceive that Voltaire's opinion of the Lusiad was drawn from a very partial acquaintance with the unfaithful and unpoetical version of Fanshaw.

And, as if all his mifrepresentations of the Lusiad were not enough, a new and most capital objection is added in the late editions of Voltaire. " Mais de tous les defauts de ce poëme, &c."-"But of all the faults of this poem, the greatest is the want of connection, which reigns in every part of it. It refembles the voyage which is its subject. The adventures succeed one another, (a awonderful objection) and the poet has no other art, than to tell his tales well." Indeed! but the reader cannot now be surprised at any of our Critic's misrepresentations -Though he has condemned the machinery of the Lufiad UPON CIRCUMSTANCES WHICH HAVE NO PLACE IN 1T, the mixture of Christian and Pagan mythology, which he in general ascribes to it, requires some attention. A short Dissertation on the poem is therefore necessary; and an examen of its conduct will clearly evince, that the Eneid itself is not more perfect than the Lusiad in that connection, which is requisite to form One whole, according to the strictest rules of Epic Unity.

The term Epopæia is derived from the Greek Έπος, discourse, and hence the Epic, may be rendered the narrative poem. In the full latitude of this definition some Italian critics have contended, tended, that the poems of Dante and Ariosto were Epic. And in the same manner Telemachus and the Faerie Queen are Epic poems. A definition more restricted however, a definition descriptive of the noblest species of poetry, has been given by Aristotle; and the greatest critics have followed him, in appropriating to this species the term of Epopæia, or Epic. The subject of the Epopæia, according to that great father of criticism, must be One. One action must be invariably pursued, and heightened through different stages, till the Catastrophe close it in so complete a manner, that any farther addition would only inform the reader of what he already perceives. Yet in purfuing this One end, collateral Epifodes not only give that variety so effential to good poetry, but, under judicious management, affift in the most pleasing manner to facilitate and produce the Unravelment, or Catastrophe. Thus the anger of Achilles is the subject of the Iliad. He withdraws his affiftance from the Greeks. The efforts and distresses of the Grecian army in his absence, and the triumphs of Hector, are the confequences of his rage. In the utmost danger of the Greeks, he permits his friend Patroclus to go to battle. Patroclus is killed by Hector. Achilles, to revenge his fall, rushes to the field. Hector is killed, the Trojans defeated, and the rage of Achilles is foothed by the obsequies of his friend. And thus also the subject of the Eneid is One. The remains of the Trojan nation, to whom a seat of empire is promised by the oracle, are represented as endangered by a tempest at sea. They land at Carthage. Eneas, their leader, relates the fate of Troy to the hospitable queen; but is ordered by Jupiter to fulfil the prophecies, and go in fearch of the promifed feat of that empire, which was one day to command the world. Eneas again fets fail, many adventures befal him. He at last lands in Italy, where prophecies of his arrival were acknowledged. His fated bride, however, is betrothed to Turnus. A war ensues, and the poem concludes with the death of the rival of Eneas. In both thefe great poems a machinery fuitable to the allegorical religion of these times is preserved. Juno is the guardian of the Greeks, Venus of the Trojans. Narrative poetry without fiction can never please. Without fiction it must want the marvellous, which is the very foul of poefy; and hence a machinery is indiffensible in the Epic poem. The conduct and machinery machinery of the Lusiad are as follow: The poem opens with a view of the Portuguese fleet before a prosperous gale on the coast of Ethiopia. The crews, however, are worn with labour, and their safety depends upon their fortune in a friendly harbour. The Gods of ancient or poetical mythology are represented as in council. The fate of the Eastern world depends upon the fuccess of the fleet. But as we trace the machinery of the Lusiad, let us remember that, like the machinery of Homer and Virgil, it is also allegorical. Jupiter, or the Lord of Fate, pronounces that the Lusians shall be prosperous. Bacchus, the evil dæmon or genius of Mohammedism, who was worshipped in the East, foreseeing that his empire and altars would be overturned, opposes love, or Fate. The celestial Venus, or heavenly Love, pleads for the Lusians. Mars, or divine Fortitude, encourages the Lord of Fate to remain unaltered; and Maia's son, the Messenger of Heaven, is sent to lead the navy to a friendly harbour. The fleet arrives at Mozambic. Bacchus, like Juno in the Eneid, raises a commotion against the Lusians. A battle ensues, and the victorious fleet pursue their voyage, under the care of a Moorish pilot, who advises them to enter the harbour of Quiloa. According to history they attempted this harbour, where their destruction would have been inevitable; but they were driven from it by the violence of a sudden tempest. The poet ascribes this to the celestial Venus,

— whose watchful care Had ever been their guide —

They now arrive at Mombassa. The malice of the evil dæmon or genius of Mohammedism, still exites the arts of treachery against them. Hermes, the messenger of heaven, in a dream, in the style of Homer, warns the hero of the poem of his danger, and commands him to steer for Melinda. There he arrives, and is received by the prince in the most friendly manner. Here the hero receives the first certain intelligence or hope of India. The prince of Melinda's admiration of the fortitude and prowess of his guests, the first who had ever dared to pass the unknown ocean by the tempestuous Cape, artfully prepares the reader for a long episode. The poem of Virgil contains the history of the Roman empire to his own time.

Camoens perceived this, and trod in his steps. The history of Portugal, which Gama relates to the king of Melinda, is not only necessary to give their new ally an high idea of the Lusian prowefs and spirit, but also naturally leads to, and accounts for the voyage of Gama; the event, which in its consequences, sums up the Portuguese honours. It is as requisite for Gama to tell the rise of his nation to the king of Melinda, as it is for Eneas to relate to Dido the cause of his voyage, the destruction of Troy. And Gama's long account of his own voyage, will bear to be read after the similar parts of either the Odyssey or the Eneid. Pleased with the same of their nation, the king of Melinda vows lasting friendship with the Lusians, and gives them a faithful pilot. As they fail across the great Indian ocean the machinery is again employed. The evil dæmon implores Neptune and the powers of the sea to raise a tempest to destroy the sleet. The sailors on the night watch, fortify their courage by the valiant acts of their countrymen, and an episode in the true poetical spirit of chivalry is introduced. Achilles in his tent is represented as singing to his lyre the praises of heroes. And in the Epic conduct, this narrative and the tales told by Nestor, either to restrain or inslame the rage of the Grecian chiefs, are certainly the same.

The accumulation of the tempest in the meanwhile is finely described. It now descends. Celestial Venus perceives the danger of her sleet. She is introduced by the appearance of her star, a stroke of poetry which would have shined in the Eneid.

The tempest is in its utmost rage,

The sky and ocean blending, each on fire, Seem'd as all nature struggled to expire.

When now the silver star of Love appear'd;
Bright in her east her radiant front she rear'd;
Fair through the horrid storm the gentle ray
Announced the promise of the cheerful day.

From her bright throne Celestial Love beheld.

The tempest burn—

And in the true spirit of Homer's allegory (See the note, p. 266.) The calls her nymphs, and by their ministry stills the tempest. Gama now arrives in India. Every circumstance rises from the preceding one; and, as fully pointed out in the notes, the conduct

duct in every circumstance is as exactly Virgilian, as any two tragedies may possibly be alike in adherence to the rules of the drama. Gama, having accomplished his purpose in India, sets fail for Europe, and the machinery is the last time employed. Venus, to reward her heroes, raises a Paradisaical island in the sea. Voltaire, in his English essay, has said, that no nation but the Portuguese and Italians could bear such lascivious description. In the French he has suppressed this sentence, but has compared it to a Dutch brothel allowed for the failors. Yet this idea of it is as false as it is gross. Every thing in the island of Love resembles the statue of Venus de Medicis. The description is warm indeed, but it is chaste as the first loves of Adam and Eve in Milton. And fo far from deferving the censure of Voltaire (See the note, p. 394.) were Dante, Ariosto, Tasso, Spenser, and even Milton himself, to contend with him for the palm of modesty, there could be no hesitation in fixing it upon the brow of Camoens. After the poet has explained the allegory of the island of Love, the Goddess of the ocean gives her hand and commits her empire to Gama, whom she conducts to her palace, where, in a prophetic fong, he hears the actions of the heroes who were to establish the Portuguese empire in the East. In Epic conduct nothing can be more masterly. The funeral games in honour of Patroclus, after the Iliad has turned upon its great hinge, the death of Hector, are here most happily imitated after the Lusiad has also turned upon its great hinge, the discovery of India. The conduct is the same, though not one feature is borrowed. Ulysses and Eneas are fent to visit the regions of the dead; and Voltaire's hero must also be conveyed to Hell and Heaven. But how superior is the spirit of Camoens! He parrallels these striking adventures by a new fiction of his own. Gama in the island of Bliss, and Eneas in Hell, are in Epic conduct exactly the same; and in this unborrowing sameness, he artfully interweaves the bistory of Portugal: artfully as Voltaire himself confesses. episode with the king of Melinda, the description of the painted enfigns, and the prophetic fong, are parallel in manner and purpose with the episode of Dido, the shield of Eneas, and the vision in Elysium. To revenge the rage of Achilles, and to lay the foundation of the Roman empire, are the grand purposes of the Iliad and Eneid; the one effected by the

the death of Hector; the other by the alliance of Latinus and Eneas, accomplished in the death of Turnus. In like manner, to establish the Portuguese Christian empire in the East, is the grand design of the Lusiad, accomplished in the happy return of Gama. And thus, in the true spirit of the Epopæia, ends the Lusiad, a poem where every circumstance rises in just gradation, till the whole is summed up in the most perfect unity of Epic action.

The machinery of Homer (See the note, p. 266.) contains a most perfect and masterly allegory. To imitate the ancients was the prevailing taste when Camoens wrote; and their poetical manners were every where adopted. That he efteemed his own as allegorical he affures us in the end of the ninth book, and in one of his letters. But a proof even more determinate, occurs in the opening of the poem. Castera, the French Translator, by his over refinement, has much mifrepresented the allegory of the Lusiad. Mars, who never appears but once in the first book, he tells us, signifies Jesus Christ. This explanation, so open to ridicule, is every way unnecessary, and furely never entered the thought of Camoens. It is evident, however, that he intended the guardian powers of Christianity and Mohammedism under the two principal personages of his machinery. Words cannot be plainer:

Where'er this people should their empire raise, She knew her altars should unnumber'd blaze; And barbarous nations at her holy shrine Be humanised and taught her lore divine: Her spreading honours thus the one inspir'd, And one the dread to lose his worship sir'd.

And the same idea is on every opportunity repeated and enforced. Pagan mythology had its Celestial, as well as Terrestrial Venus*.

"The celetial Venus, according to Plato, was the daughter of Ouranus or Heaven, and thence called Urania. The passage stands in the Symposion of that author as follows: Πανθες γαρ ισμεν στι εκ ες είν αντι Ερωίος Αφροδιτη ταυθης δε μιας μεν εσνς, εις αν ην Ερως επει δε δυο ες ον, δυο αναγκη και Ερωίε είναι. πως δου δυο τα θεα; η μεν γε που, πρεσβυθερα, και αμηλωρ, Ουρανε θυγάθηρ, ην δη και ουρανιαν επονομαζομεν η δε νεωίερα, Διος κή Διωνης, ην δη πανδημεν καλεμεν.

This Urania-Venus, according to Paufanias and other writers, had fumptuous temples in Athens, Phœnicia, &c. She was painted in complete armour; her priestesses were virgins; and no man was allowed to approach her shrine. Xenophon says, she presided over the love of wisdom and virtue, which are the pleasures of the soul, as the terrestrial Venus presided over the pleasures of the body.

The Celestial Venus is therefore the most proper personage of that mythology to figure Christianity. And Bacchus, the conqueror of the East, is, in the ancient poetical allegory, the most natural protector of the altars of India. Whatever may be faid against the use of the ancient machinery in a modern poem, candour must confess, that the allegory of Camoens which arms the genius of Mohammedism + against the expedition of his heroes, is both sublime and most happily interesting. Nor must his choice of the ancient poetical machinery be condemned without examination. It has been the language of poetry these three thousand years, and its allegory is perfectly understood. If not impossible, it will certainly be very difficult to find a new, or a better machinery for an Epic poem. That of Tasso is condemned by Boileau, yet, that of Camoens may plead the authority of that celebrated critic, and is even vindicated, undefignedly, by Voltaire himfelf. In an essay prefixed to his Henriade, Le mot d' Amphitrite, says he. dans notre poesse, ne signifie que la Mer, & non l'Epouse de Neptune —the word Amphitrite in our poetry fignifies only the Sea, and not the wife of Neptune." And why may not the word Venus in Camoens fignify divine Love, and not the wife of Vulcan? "Love, fays Voltaire, in the same essay, has his arrows, and Justice a ballance, in our most christian writings, in our paintings, in our tapestry, without being esteemed as the least mixture of Paganism." And if this criticism has justice in it, why not apply it to the Lusiad as well as the * Henriade? Candour will not only apply it to the Lufiad, but will also add the authority of Boileau. He is giving rules for an Epic poem:

† This, as observed, is expressly suggested in the first book. For several collateral proofs, see the note, p. 215, and text, p. 339. where Bacchus, the evil dæmon, takes the form of Mohammed, and appears in a dream to a priest of the Koran.

Thus, when the Henriade is to be defended, the arrows of Cupid convey no mixture of Paganisin. But when the island of Love in the Lusiad is to be condemned, our bonnête critic must ridicule the use of these very arrows — C'est la que Venus, aidée des conseils du Pere Eternel, et secondre en meme sems des fleches de Cupidon .- It is there that Venus, aided by the counfels of the Eternal Father, and at the same time, seconded by the arrows of Cupid, renders the Nereides amourous of the Portuguese."—But this, one of his latest additions, is as unlucky as all the rest. The Eternal Father is the same Jove, who is represented as the Supreme Father in the first book, (St. 22. Portuguese.) and in book 9. st. 18. is only said to have ordained Venus to be the good genius of the Lusitanians. There is not a word about the affisiance of bis counsel; that was introduced by Voltaire, folely to throw ridicule upon an allegory, which, by the bye, when used in the Henriade, has not the least fault; but is there every way in the true style of poetry.

Dans le vaste récit d'une longue action,
Se soutient par la fable, et vit de siction.
Lá pour nous enchanter tout est mis en usage:
Tout prend un corps, une ame, un esprit, un visage;
Chaque vertu devient une divinité;
Minerve est la prudence, & Venus la beauté.
Ce n'est plus la vapeur qui produit le tonnerre,
C'est fupiter armé pour esfrayer la terre.
Un orage terrible aux yeux des matelots,
C'est Neptune en courroux, qui gourmande les slots...
Sans tous ces ornemens le vers tombe en langueur;
La poesie est morte, ou rampe sans vigueur:
Le poëte n'est plus qu'un orateur timide,
Qu'un froid bistorien d'une fable inspide.

Every idea of these lines strongly defends the Lusiad. Yet, it must not be concealed, a distinction follows which may appear against it. Boileau requires a profane subject for the Epic Muse. But his reason for it is not just:

De la foi d'un Chrétien les mysteres terribles D'ornemens égayés ne sont point susceptibles. L'evangile à l'esprit n'offre de tous cotés Que penitence a faire, & tourmens merités: Et de vos sictions le melange coupable Même à ses vérités donne l'air de la fable.

The mysteres terribles afford indeed no subject for poetry. But the Bible offers to the Muse something besides penitence and merited torments. The Paradise Lost, and the works of the greatest Painters, evince this. Nor does this criticism, false as it is, contain one argument which excludes the heroes of a Christian nation from being the subject of poetry. Modern subjects are indeed condemned by Boileau, and ancient sable, with its Ulysses, Agamemnon, &c. — noms beureux semblent nés pour les vers—are recommended to the poet. But, happy for Camoens, his feelings directed him to another choice. For, in contradiction of a thousand Boileaus, no compositions are so miserably uninteresting as our modern poems, where the heroes of ancient sable are the personages of the action. Unless, therefore, therefore, the subject of Camoens + may thus seem condem ned by the celebrated French critic, every other rule he proposes is in savour of the machinery of the Lusiad. For whatever report Falsehood and Voltaire may have raised against it, in the machinery there is no mixture of Pagan and Christian personages. The heroes, indeed, are Christians, and Santa Fe, holy saith, is sometimes mentioned. But the allegorical and historical parts of an Epic poem are essentially different, though the historical part be even often conducted under the veil of allegory; as, according to the precepts of Boileau, the deliverance of the Lusian sleet is ascribed to the celestial Venus. Nor is poetical use the only defence of our injured author. In the age of Camoens, Bacchus was esteemed a real * dæmon: And celestial

† But to carry the restriction so far, was certainly not the meaning of Boileau: for he himself uses the Pagan mythology in his poem on the passage of the Rhine by the French army in 1672.

* It was the belief of the first ages of Christianity, that the Pagan Gods were fallen angels. Milton, with admirable judgment, has adopted this system. His Mammon, the architect of Pandæmonium, he also calls Vulcan:

Nor was his name unheard or unador'd In ancient Greece, and in Ausonian land. Men call'd him Mulciber; and how he fell From heaven, they fabled, thrown by angry

On Lemnos, th' Egean isle: Thus they relate Erring; for he with this rebellious rout Fell long before.

Moloch and Vulcan are therefore mentioned together with great propriety in the Paradife Lost. The belief of the first Christians, with respect to dæmons, was unabated in the age of Camoens; for the oracles of the Pagan deities were then believed to have been given by evil spirits. Bacchus might therefore in a Christian poem of such ages represent the Evil dæmon; and it was on this principle that Tasso felt no impropriety in calling Pluto his king of hell, the grand fee of mankind, and making him talk of the birth of Christ. In like manner, when Camoens says that the Christian altar raised (book II.) to deceive the Lusians, was the illusion of Bacchus; he says no more than what was agreeable to the popular belief, which esteemed the Pagan gods real dæmons, and no more than what poetry allows when a florm is ascribed to Neptune: In a word, it is not the illusions which Tasso ascribes to his magic, or Camoens to Bacchus; it is the unallegorical opposition or concert of Christian and Pagan ideas, which forms the absurd, and disfigures a poem. But this abfurd opposition or concert of personages has no place in the machinery of the Lusiad, though it is found in the greatest of modern poets. The power of magic opposes the power of God and his arch-angel Michael in Tasso. But from Milton both the allowable and blameable mixture of Christian and Pagan ideas may be best exemplified. With great judgment, as already observed, he ranks the Pagan deities among the fallen angels. When he alludes to Pagan mythology, he sometimes fays, "as fables seign;" and sometimes he mentions these deities in the allegory of poetical style; as thus,

With all her battering engines bent to rafe Some capital city—

And thus, when Adam smiles on Eve;

On Juno smiles when he impregns the clouds That shed May flowers—

Here the personages are mentioned expressly in their allegorical capacity, a use recommended by Boileau. In the following the blameable mixture occurs. He is describing Paradise——

- Universal

Venus was considered as the name by which the Ethnics expressed the divine Love. But if the cold hyper-critic will still blame our author for his allegory, let it also be remembered, that of all Christian poets, Camoens is in this the least reprehensible. The Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise of Dante, form one continued texture of Pagan and Scriptural names, descriptions, and ideas. Ariosto is continually in the same fault; and in this, and his addition of Gothic inchantment, he is followed by Tasso. The Paradise Lost also has this mixture, in a manner not to be found in the Lusiad. And if it is a fault to use the ancient poetical machinery in a poem where the heroes are Christians, Voltaire himself has infinitely more of the melange coupable than Camoens. The machinery of his Henriade is, as confessed by himself, upon the idea of the Pagan mythology. He cites Boileau.

C'est d'un scrupule vain s'allarmer sottement, Et vouloir aux lecteurs plaire sans agrément Bien-tot ils desendront de peindre la prudence, De donner a Thémis ni bandeau, ni balance Et par-tout des discours, comme une idolatrie, Dans leur saux zele iront chasser l'allegorie.

But he suppresses the verses which immediately follow, where the introduction of the true God is prohibited by the critic,

Et fabuleux chrétiens, n'allons point dans nos songes, Du Dieu de vérité faire un Dieu de mensonges.

Mit with the Graces and the Hours in dance Led on th' eternal spring. Not that fair field Of Enna, where Proserpin, gathering flowers, Herself a fairer flower, by gloomy Dis Was gather'd: which cost Ceres all that pain To seek her through the world — might with this Paradise Of Eden strive

The mention of Pan, the Graces and Hours, is here in the pure allegorical fivle of poetry. But the story of Proserpin is not in allegory; it is mentioned in the same manner of authenticity as the many Scripture historics introduced into the Paradise Lost. When the angel brings Eve to Adam, she appears in naked beauty more adorn'd More lovely than Pandora, whom the Gods Endow'd with all their gifts, and O too like In fad event, when to th' unwifer fun Of Japhet hrought by Hermes fine enfnar'd Mankind with her fair looks, to be avenged On him who had stole Jove's authentic fire.

Here we have the heathen Gods, another origin of evil, and a whole string of fables, alluded to as real events, on a level with his subject. Nor are these the only instances; the death of Hercules, and several others in Milton, demerit the censure of an unjudicious mixture of sacred and profane mythology and history.

Yet, the God of truth according to the Christian idea, in direct violation of this precept, is a considerable personage in the Pagan allegorical machinery of the Henriade. But the couplet last cited, though as direct against the Henriade as if it had been written to condemn it, is not in the least degree applicable to the machinery of the Lusiad; a machinery much less culpable, according to the severest criticism, than that of Tasso, and infinitely superior in every respect to that of ‡ Voltaire, though Camoens wrote at the revival of learning, ere criticism had given her best rules to the modern Muse.

The poem of Camoens, indeed, so fully vindicates itself, that this defence of it perhaps may seem unnecessary. Yet one confideration will vindicate this defence. The poem is written in a language unknown in polite literature. Few are able to judge of the Original, and the unjust clamour raised against it by Rapin * and Voltaire, has been received in Europe as its true character. Lord Kaimes +, and other authors, very cordially of Tasso and Voltaire.

† See the Differtation on the Machinery

It is an unhappy thing to write in an unread tongue. Never was author fo misrepresented by ignorance as the poet of Portugal. Rapin, that cold-blooded critic, tells us, that to write a good Epic, Il faut observer de la proportion dans le dessein, it is neccssary to observe proportion in the design, justness in the thought, and not to fall into rambling."—He then afferts, that Camoens trespasses against all these rules - that he wants discernment, and conduct-that he thought of nothing but to express the pride of his nation, for his style, he says, est fier & fastueux, fierce and stilted. In another place he says, "poetical diction ought to be clear, natural, and harmonious, and that obscurity is its greatest blemish,"-to which, having named Camoens, he adds, " fes vers sont si obscurs, qu'ils pourroient passer pour des mysteres—his verses are so obscure that they may pass for mysteries."-Perhaps the old French version may deserve this character; but certain it is from hence, that Rapin never read the original. Perfpicuity, elegant simplicity, and the most natural unstrained harmony, is the just cha-racteristic of the style of Camoens. The appeal is to the world. And the first Linguist of the age, has given the style of Ca-moens a very different character from this of Rapin: Camoensium Lusitanum, cujus poesis aded venusta est, aded polita, ut nihil esse possit jucundius; interdum verò, adeò elata, grandiloqua, ac sonora, ut nihil fingi possit magnifi-centius. JONES, Poeseos Asiat. Comment. Montesquieu's high idea of the Lusiad is cited p. 227. We shall only add the suffrage of the great Cervantes, who, in his Don Quixote, C. iv. l. 6. most warmly expresses his idea of the excellence of the genius of Camoens. + Lord Kaimes thus follows Voltaire: " Portugal was rifing in power and splendor " (it was hastening to the very last stages " of declension) when Camoens wrote the "Lusiad, and with respect to the music of verse it has merit. The author however is far from shining in point of taste (most " masterly description and boundless variety " however are his characteristics. He has " given the two finest sictions in poetry. " And according to Voltaire the story of Inez "is equal to the best written parts of Virgil.)

"He makes a strange jumble of Heathen
"and Christian Deities. "Gama" ob"ferves Voltaire, "in a storm addresses his prayers to Christ, but it is Venus who "comes to his relief." Voltaire's obser-" vation is but too well founded (and is it " indeed in the name of bonesty!) In the condemn its mixture of Pagan and Christian mythology; even condemn it in terms, as if the Lusiad, the poem which of all other modern ones is the most unexceptionable in this, were in this mixture the most egregiously unsufferable — Besides, whatever has the sanction of the celebrated name of Voltaire will be remembered, and unless circumstantially resuted, may

" first book, Jove summons a council of " the Gods, which is described at great " length, for no earthly purpose but to shew " that he favoured the Portuguese: Bacchus, on the other hand, declares against " them on the following account, that he "himfelf had gained immortal glory as conqueror of India; which would be " eclipsed if the Indies should be conquered "a fecond time by the Portuguese. A
"Moorish commander having received
"Gama with smiles, but with hatred in " his heart, the poet brings down Bacchus " from heaven to confirm the Moor in his " wicked purposes, which would have been " perpetrated, had not Venus interposed in "Gama's behalf. In the second canto " Bacchus feigns himself to be a Christian, in order to deceive the Portuguese, but " Venus implores her father Jupiter to pro-test them." Such is the view of the Lufiad given by a professed Critic. It is impossible to make any remark on it without giving offence to False Delicacy. But to that goddess the Translator of the injured Camoens will offer no facrifice. What ignorance of the Epic poem, unpardonable in a professed dictator in criticism, does the whole of it betray! Lucan has been feverely censured by the greatest of ancient and modern critics, for the want of poetical cloathing or allegory. But we have already been explicit on that allegorical personification in which the true fpirit of poetry exists. In this manner Virgil and Homer conduct their poems. (See the note, p. 267.) But our critic perceives nothing of this kind in Camoens. Though the whole conduct of the Lusiad depends upon the council held by Jove, upon the allegorical parts taken by the personages,

Her spreading honours thus the one inspir'd, And one the dread to lose his worship fir'd—

and though this allegory is finely fullained

throughout the whole poem, where Celestial Love is ever mindful (See B. 9.) that Jove or fate had decreed her altars should be reared in consequence of the success of her heroes; though all this is truly Homeric, is what the world ever esteemed the true Epic conduct, our critic can see no earthly purpose in the council of Jove, but to shew that he favoured the Lusians; no reason for the opposition of Bacchus, but that he had been conqueror of India, and was averse it should be con-quered a second time. In the same ignorance of the Epic conduct is the wacant account of Bacchus and the Moor. But let our critic be told, that through the fides of Camoens, if his blow will avail, he has murdered hoth Homer and Virgil. What condemns Bacchus and the Moor, condemns the part of Juno in the Eneid, and every interpolition of Juno and Neptune in Homer. To make the Lusians believe that Mombassa was inhabited by Christians, the Moors took the Ambassadors of Gama to a house, where they shewed them a Christian altar. This is history. Camoens, in the true spirit of the Epic poetry, ascribes this appearance to the illusion of Bacchus. Hector and Turnus are both thus deceived. And Bacchus, as already proved, was efteemed a fallen angel when our poet wrote. Nor are the ancients alone thus reprobated in the fentence passed upon Camoens. If his machinery must be condemned, with what accumulated weight must his sentence fall upon the greatest of our modern poets! But the mystery is easily explained: There are a race of Critics, who cannot perceive the noble prosopopæia of Milton's angels, who would reduce a Virgil to a Lucan, a Camoens to a mere historian; who would strip poetry of all her ornaments, because they cannot see them, of all her passions, because they cannot feel them; in a word, who would leave her nothing but the neatness, the cadence, and tinkle of verse.

one time perhaps * be appealed to, as decisive, in the controversies of literary + merit.

Other views of the conduct of the Lufiad now offer themfelves. Besides the above remarks, many observations on the machinery and poetical conduct, are in their proper places scattered throughout the notes. The exuberant exclamations

 Voltaire's description of the apparition near the Cape of Good Hope, is just as wide of the original as bombast is from the true sublime; yet it has been cited by several writers. In Camoens a dark cloud hovers over the fleet, a tremendous noise is heard, Gama exclaims in amazement, and the apparition appears in the air,

- rifing thro' the darken'd air, Appall'd we faw an hideous Phantom glare .-

Every part of the description in Camoens is fublime and nobly adapted for the pencil. In Voltaire's last edition, the passage is thus tendered -- " C'est une fantome, que l'èlève it is a phantome which rises from the bottom of the fea; his head touches the clouds; the tempests, the winds, the thunders are around him, his arms are stretched afar over the furface of the waters"-Yet not one picturesque idea of this is in the Original. If the phantom's arms are stretched upon the surface of the waters, his shoulders, and his head which touches the clouds, must only be above the tide. Yet, though this imagerie, with tempests, winds and thunders banging around him, would be truly absurd upon canvas, a celebrated Italian writer has not only cited Voltaire's desciption, as that of the Original, but has mended that of the Frenchman by a stroke of his own. The feet of the Phantom, fays Signor Algaretti, are in the unfathomable abysis of the sea." (See bis treatise on Newton's Theory of Light and Colours) And certainly, if his shoulders and head reached from the surface of the waters to the clouds, the length which the Signor has given to his parts under the water was no bad calculation. Nor is Algarotti the only abfurd retailer of Voltaire's misrepresentations. An English Traveller, who lately published an account of Spain and Portugal, has quite compleated the figure. " Ses bras J'etendent au loin sur la surface des eaux, says Voltaire; and our Traveller thus translates it, His arms extend over the whole surface of the waters." And thus the burlesque painter is furnished with the finest design imaginable for the mock fublime. A figure up to the arm-pits in the water, its arms extending over the whole furface of the sea, its head in the clouds, and its feet in the unfathomable abyss of the ocean! Very fine indeed, it is impossible to mend it farther. Nor is our Traveller's specimen of the Portuguese literature less happy. He very candidly, and with much knowledge of his subject, retails several of the gross misrepresentations and falsities of Voltaire; and also adds a little blunder or two of his own 1. And though this Traveller could not perceive | any beauty in the episode of the fixth Lufiad, that episode will not yield in poetical merit to all the tales of Nestor in Homer.

† As we have paid attention to the strictures of Voltaire, some is also due to the praises which he bestows on the Lusiad. Though he falsely afferts that it wants connection, he immediately adds, " Tout cela preuve enfin, que l'ouvrage est plein des grandes beautés-This only proves, in fine, that the work is full of grand beauties, fince these two hundred years it has been the delight of an ingenious nation."-The fiction of the apparition, he owns, will please in every age; and of the episode of Inez, he says, Il y a peu d'endroits dans Virgile plus attendrissants & mieux ecrits—There are few parts of Virgil more tender or better written."

‡ As for example, Camoens, he fays, was born in 1523, whilft John III. reigned, whose successfor, Don Emmanuel, sent Vasco de Gama on the discovery of India." But this is just the same as if a Portuguese should give his countrymen an account of England, and tell them that George 1. was succeeded by Queen Anne; and that Shakespeare was born in the reign of King James.

of Camoens are there defended. Here let it only be added, that the unity of action is not interrupted by these Parentheses, and that if Milton's beautiful complaint of his blindness be not an imitation of them, it is in the same manner and spirit. Nor will we scruple to pronounce that such addresses to the Muse would have been admired in Homer, are an interesting improvement on the Epopæia, and will certainly be imitated if ever the world shall behold another real Epic poem.

The Lusiad, says Voltaire, contains a fort of Epic poetry unbeard of before. No beroes are wounded a thousand different ways; no woman enticed away and the world overturned for ber cause.—But the very want of these, in place of supporting the objection intended by Voltaire, points out the happy judgment and peculiar excellence of Camoens. If Homer has given us all the fire and hurry of battles, he has also given us all the uninteresting tiresome detail. What reader but must be tired with the deaths of a thousand heroes, who are never mentioned before nor afterwards in the poem. Yet in every battle we are wearied out with such Gazette returns of the slain and wounded——

"Ενθα τίνα ωςῶτον, τίνα δ'ὕσλαλον ἐξενάςιξεν
"Εκλως Πριαμίδης, ὅτε οἱ Ζεὺς κῦδος ἐδωκεν;
'Ασσαῖον μὲν πςῶτα, κὰ Αὐτόνοον, κὰ Ὀπίτην,
Καὶ Δόλοπα Κλυλίδην, κὰ 'Οφέλλιον, ἡδ 'Αγέλαον,
Αἰσυμνόν τ' Ωςον τε, κὰ Ἱππόνοον μενεχάρμην
Τες ἄς ὄγ ἡγεμόνας Δαναῶν ἔλεν αὐτὰς ἐωειλα
Πληθύν ὡς ὁωότε, &c.

Il. Lib. XI. lin. 299.

Thus imitated by Virgil,

Cædicus Alcathoum obtruncat, Sacrator Hydaspem: Partheniumque Rapo, & prædurum viribus Orsen: Messapus Cloniumque, Lycaoniumque Ericetem: Illum, infrænis equi lapsu tellure jacentem; Hunc, peditem pedes. Et Lycius processerat Agis, Quem tamen haud expers Valerus virtutis avitæ Dejecit: Atronium Salius; Saliumque Nealces—

Æn. l. x. 747-

With fuch catalogues is every battle extended; and what can be more tirefome than fuch uninteresting descriptions and their imitations! If the idea of the battle be raifed by fuch ennumeration, still the copy and original are so near each other, that they can never please in two separate poems. Nor are the greater parts of the battles of the Eneid much more distant from those of the Iliad. Though Virgil with great art has introduced a Camilla, a Pallas, and a Laufus, still in many particulars, and in the action upon the whole, there is fuch a fameness with the Iliad, that the learned reader of the Eneid is deprived of the pleasure inspired by originality. If the man of taste, however, will be pleased to mark how the genius of a Virgil has managed a war after a Homer, he will certainly be tired with a dozen of Epic poems in the same style. Where the seige of a town and battles are the subject of an Epic, there will of necessity, in the characters and circumstances, be a resemblance to Homer; and such poem must therefore want originality. Happy for Tasso, the variation of manners, and his masterly superiority over Homer in describing his duels, has given his Jerusalem an air of novelty. Yet with all the difference between Christian and Pagan heroes, we have a Priam, an Agamamnon, an Achilles, &c. armies flaughtered, and a city befieged. In a word, we have a handsome copy of the Iliad in the Jerusalem Delivered. If some imitations, however, have been fuccessful, how many other Epics of ancient and modern times have hurried down the stream of oblivion! Some of their authors had poetical merit, but the fault was in the choice of their subjects. So fully is the strife of war exhausted by Homer, that Virgil and Tasso could add to it but little novelty; no wonder, therefore, that so many Epics on battles and seiges have been suffered to sink into utter neglect. Camoens, perhaps, did not weigh these circumstances, but the strength of his poetical genius directed him. He could not but feel what it was to read Virgil after Homer; and the original turn and force of his mind led him from the beaten tract of Helen's and Lavinia's, Achilles's and Hector's, seiges and slaughters, where the hero hews down and drives to flight whole armies with his own fword. Camoens was the first who wooed the Modern Epic Muse, and she gave him the wreath of a first Lover: A firt of Epic Poetry unbeard of before; or, as Voltaire

Voltaire calls it in his last edition, une nouvelle espèce d'Epopée. And the grandest subject it is (of profane history) which the world has ever beheld*. A voyage esteemed too great for man to dare; the adventures of this voyage through unknown oceans deemed unnavigable; the Eastern World happily discovered, and for ever indissolubly joined and given to the Western; the grand Portuguese empire in the East sounded; the humanization of mankind and universal commerce the consequence! What are the adventures of an old fabulous hero's arrival in Britain, what are Greece and Latium in arms for a woman, compared to this! Troy is in ashes, and even the Roman empire is no more. But the effects of the voyage, adventures, and bravery of the Hero of the Lusiad, will be felt and beheld, and perhaps increase in importance, while the world shall remain.

Happy in his choice, happy also was the genius of Camoens in the method of pursuing his subject. He has not, like Tasso, given it a total appearance of fiction; nor has he, like Lucan, excluded allegory and poetical machinery. Whether he intended it or not, for his genius was sufficient to suggest its propriety, the judicious precept of Petronius is the model of the Lusiad. That elegant writer proposes a poem on the civil war; Ecce Belli Civilis, says he, ingens opus—Non enim res gestæ versibus comprehendendæ sunt (quod longe melius historici faciunt) sed per ambages Deorumque ministeria, & fabulosum sententiarum tormentum præcipitandus est liber spiritus: ut potius furentis animi vaticinatio appareat, quam religiosæ orationis sub testibus sides-No poem, ancient or modern, merits this character in any degree comparative to the Lusiad. A truth of history is preserved, yet, what is improper for the historian, the ministry of heaven is employed, and the free spirit of poetry throws itself into fictions, which makes the whole appear as an effusion of prophetic hausted. There cannot possibly be so important a voyage as that which gave the Eastern world to the Western. And did even the story of Columbus afford materials equal to that of Gama, the adventures of the hero, and the view of the extent of his discoveries, must now appear as servile copies of the Lusiad. The view of Spanish America, given in the Auracana, is not only a mere copy, but is introduced even by the very machinery of Camoens.

^{*} The Drama and the Epopecia are in nothing so different as in this: The subjects of the Drama are inexhaustible, those of the Epopecia are perhaps exhausted. He who chuses war and the warlike characters, cannot appear as an original. It was well for the memory of Pope, that he did not write the Epic poem he intended. It would have been only a copy of Virgil. Camoens and Milton have been happy in the novelty of their subjects; and these they have ex-fury, and not like a rigid detail of facts given under the fanction of witnesses. Contrary to Lucan, who, in the above rules drawn from the nature of poetry, is severely cendemned by Petronius, Camoens conducts his poem per ambages Deorumque ministeria. The apparition, which in the night hovers athwart the fleet near the Cape of Good Hope, is the grandest fiction in human composition; the invention his own! In the Island of Venus, the use of which fiction in an Epic poem is also his own, he has given the compleatest assemblage of all the flowers which have ever adorned the bowers of love. And never was the furentis animi vaticinatio, more conspicuously displayed than in the prophetic fong, the view of the spheres, and of the globe of the earth. Tasso's imitation of the Island of Venus is not equal to the original; and though "Virgil's myrtles * dropping blood are nothing to Tasso's inchanted forest," what are all Ismeno's inchantments to the grandeur and horror of the appearance, prophecy, and evanishment of the spectre of Camoens! ‡—It has been long agreed among the critics, that the folemnity of religious observances gives great dignity to the historical narrative of the Epopæia. Camoens, in the embarkation of the fleet, and in feveral other places, is peculiarly happy in the dignity of religious allusions. Manners and character are also required in the Epic poem. But all the Epics which have appeared, are, except two, mere copies of the Iliad in these. Every one has its Agamemnon, Achilles, Ajax, and Ulysses, its calm, furious, gross and intelligent hero. Camoens and Milton happily left this beaten tract, this exhausted field, and have given us pictures of manners unknown in the Iliad, the Eneid, and all those poems which may be classed with the Thebaid. The Lusiad abounds with pictures of manners, from those of the highest chivalry, to those of the rudest, fiercest, and most innocent barbarism. In the fifth, sixth, and ninth books, Leonardo and Veloso are painted in stronger colours than any of the inferior characters in Virgil. But striking character, indeed, is not the excellence of the Eneid. That of Monzaida.

gal venting their murmurs upon the beach when Gama sets sail, display the richness of our Author's poetical genius, and are not inserior to any thing of the kind in the Classics.

^{*} See Letters on Chivalry and Romance.

† The Lusiad is also rendered poetical by other sictions. The elegant satyr on king Sebastian, under the name of Acteon; and the prosopopoeia of the populace of Portu-

the friend of Gama, is much superior to that of Achates. The base, selfissh, persidious and cruel characters of the Zamorim and the Moors, are painted in the strongest colours; and the character of Gama himself, is that of the finished hero. His cool command of his passions, his deep sagacity, his fixed intrepidity, his tenderness of heart, his manly piety, and his high enthusiasm in the love of his country, are all displayed in the superlative degree —— Let him who objects the want of character to the Lufiad, beware lest he stumble upon its praise; lest he only say, it wants an Achilles, a Hector, and a Priam. And to the novelty of the manners of the Lusiad let the novelty of fire-arms also be added. It has been faid, that the buckler, the bow, and the spear, must continue the arms of poetry. Yet, however unfuccessful others may have been, Camoens has proved that fire-arms may be introduced with the greatest dignity and finest effect in the Epic Poem.

As the grand interest of commerce and of mankind forms the subject of the Lusiad, so with great propriety, as necessary accompanyments to the voyage of his Hero, the Author has given poetical pictures of the four parts of the world. In the third book, a view of Europe; in the fifth, a view of Africa; and in the tenth, a picture of Asia and America. Homer and Virgil have been highly praised for their judgment in the choice of subjects which interested their countrymen, and Statius has been as severely condemned for his uninteresting choice. But though the subject of Camoens be particularly interesting to his countrymen, it has also the peculiar happiness to be the Poem of every trading nation. It is the Epic Poem of the Birth of Commerce. And in a particular manner the Epic Poem of whatever country has the controul and possession of the commerce of India.

An unexhausted fertility and variety of poetical description, an unexhausted elevation of sentiment, and a constant tenor of the grand simplicity of diction, complete the character of the Lusiad of Camoens: A poem which, though it has hitherto received from the public most unmerited neglect, and from the critics most flagrant injustice, was yet better understood by the greatest poet of Italy. Tasso never did his judgment more credit, than when he confessed that he dreaded Camoens as a this elegant Sonnet to the Hero of the Lusiad:

fations measured in the fat of N O S one unnectical

Vasco, le cui felici, ardite antenne
In contro al sol, che ne riporta il giorno
Spiegar le vele, e fer colà ritorno,
Dove egli par che di cadere accenne:

Non piú di te per aspro mar sostenne Quel, che sece al Ciclope oltraggio, e scorno: Ne chi turbó l'Arpie nel suo soggiorno, Ne dié più bel soggetto a colte penne.

Et hor quella del colto, e buon' Luigi,
Tant' oltre stende il glorioso volo
Che i tuoi spalmati legni andar men lunge.
Ond' a quelli, a cui s'alza il nostro polo,
Et a chi ferma in contra i suoi vestigi,
Per lui del corso tuo la fama aggiunge.

SONNET.

Vasco, whose bold and happy bowsprit bore Against the rising morn; and, homeward fraught, Whose sails came westward with the day, and brought The wealth of India to thy native shore:

Ne'er did the Greek such length of seas explore: The Greek, who sorrow to the Cyclop wrought, And he, who, Victor, with the Harpies sought, Never such pomp of naval honours wore.

Great as thou art, and peerless in renown,
Yet thou to Camoens ow'st thy noblest same;
Farther than thou didst sail, his deathless song
Shall bear the dazzling splendor of thy name;
And under many a sky thy actions crown,
While Time and Fame together glide along.

let clas yearn firth!

It only remains to give some account of the Version of the Lusiad, which is now offered to the Public. Besides the Tranflations mentioned in the life of Camoens, M. Duperron De Castera, in 1735, gave in French prose a loose unpoetical paraphrase * of the Lusiad. Nor does Sir Richard Fanshaw's English version, published during the usurpation of Cromwell, merit a better character. Though stanza be rendered for stanza, though at first view it has the appearance of being exceedingly literal, this version is nevertheless exceedingly unfaithful. Uncountenanced by his original, Fanshaw teems with many a dead-born jest +.

Nor had he the least idea of the dignity of the Epic I style, or of the true spirit of poetical translation. For this, indeed, no definite rule can be given. The Translator's feelings alone must direct him, for the spirit of poetry is sure to evaporate in literal translation.

Literal translation of poetry is in reality a folecism. You may construe your author, indeed, but if with some Translators you boast that you have left your author to speak for himself,

* Castera was every way unequal to his task. He did not perceive his author's beauties. He either suppresses or lowers the most poetical passages, and substitutes French tinsel and impertinence in their place. In the necessary illustrations in the notes, the citations from Castera will vindicate this character.

+ Pope, Odyss. xx.

Richard Fanshaw, Esq; afterwards Sir Richard, was English Ambassador both at Madrid and Lisbon. He had a taste for literature, and translated from the Italian feveral pieces, which were of fervice in the refinement of our poetry. Though his Lufiad, by the dedication of it to William Earl of Strafford, dated May 1, 1655, seems as published by himself, we are told by the Editor of his Letters, that "during the " unsettled times of our Anarchy, some of " his MSS. falling by misfortune into un-" skillful hands, were printed and published of a Cromwell, endeavoured to cultivate the English Muses, and the acknowledge-ment of his friend, that his Lustad received not his finishing strokes, may feem to de-mand that a veil should be thrown over its faults. And not a blemish should have been pointed out by the present Translator, if the reputation of Camoens were unconcerned, and if it were not a duty he owed his reader to give a specimen of the former translation. We have proved that Voltaire read and drew his opinion of the Lusiad from Fanshaw. And Rapin most probably drew his from the fame source. Perspicuity is the characteristic of Camoens; jet Rapin says, his verses are so obscure they appear like mysteries. Fanshaw is indeed so obscure, that in dipping into him, into parts which he had even then translated, the present Translator has often been obliged to have recourse to the Portuguese, to discover his meaning. Sancho Panza was not fonder of proverbs. He has thrust many into his

" the Lufiads."

The great respect due to the memory of a gentleman, who, in the unpropitious age

[&]quot; without his consent or knowledge, and " before he could give them his last finish-" ing strokes: Such was his translation of that you have neither added nor diminished, you have in reality grossly abused him, and deceived yourself. Your literal translation can have no claim to the original felicities of expression; the energy, elegance, and fire of the original poetry. It may bear indeed a resemblance, but such a one as a corps in the fepulchre bears to the former man when he moved in the bloom and vigour of life.

> Nec verbum verbo curabis reddere, fidus Interpres-was the taste of the Augustan age. None but a Poet can tranflate a Poet. The freedom which this precept gives, will, therefore, in a poet's hands, not only infuse the energy, elegance, and fire of his author's poetry into his own version, but will give it also the spirit of an original.

He who can construe may perform all that is claimed by the literal Translator. He who attempts the manner of translation prescribed by Horace, ventures upon a task of genius. Yet however daring the undertaking, and however he may have failed in it, the Translator acknowledges, that in this spirit he endeavoured to give the Lusiad in English. Even farther liberties in one or two instances seemed to him advantageous—version. He can never have enough of conceits, low allusions, and expressions. When gathering of flowers, " as boninas apan-bando," is simply mentioned (C. 9. st. 24.) he gives it, gather'd flowers by pecks. And the Indian Regent is avaricious (C. 8. ft. 95.)

Meaning a better penny thence to get.

But enough of these have already appeared in the notes. It is necessary now to give a few of his stanzas entire, that the reader may form an idea of the manner and spirit of the old translation. Nor shall we select the specimens. The noble attitude of Mars in the first book, is the first striking description in the poem, and is thus rendered;

Lifting a little up his Helmet-fight ('Twas adamant) with confidence enough, To give his vote himfelf he placed right Before the throne of Jove, arm'd, valiant, tough: And (giving with the butt-end of his pyke A great thump on the floor of purell lluffe)
The heavens did tremble, and Apollo's light It went, and came, like colour in a fright.

And the appearance of Indians in canoes approaching the fleet, is the very next de-feription which occurs;

For streight out of that Isle which seem'd most neer Unto the continent, Behold a number Of little Boats in companie appeer,
Which (clapping all wings on) the long Sea funder!
The men are rapt with joy, and, with the meer
Excess of it, can only look, and wonder.
What nation's this, (within themselves they say)
What rites, what laws, what king do they obey?

Their coming thus: In boats with fins; nor flat, But apt t' o're-set (as being pincht and long)

And then they'd fwim like rats . The sayles, of mat Made of palm-leaves, wove curiously and strong. The mens complexion, the self-same with that HER gave the earth's burnt parts (from heaven slung) Who was more brave than wife; That this is true The Po doth know and Lampetusa rue.

It may be necessary to add, the version of Fanshaw, though the Lusiad very particularly requires them, was given to the Public without one note.

But a minuteness * in the mention of these will not appear with a good grace in the first (perhaps last) Edition of his work:

And the original is in the hands of the world.

Though unwilling to enter into the controversy on the superiority of blank verse or rhyme, as the Translator has chosen the latter, he presumes it may not be improper to offer to the Reader the reasons which directed his choice. But he gives them not as decifive. He only confesses, that fuch is his taste-In Shakespeare, and in the best parts of Otway and Southern, the English blank verse appears in great perfection and propriety. But this is of the lambic or Dramatic kind, a kind very different from the Heroic. This, if not attainable, has never yet in perfection been attained in the English language; for certain it is, that in Milton, and every other writer of heroic blank verse, almost every four or five lines are interrupted with other two or three, which are absolute prose. Every objection against rhyme recurs with accumulated charge against blank heroics. The monotony of the Night Thoughts, The Seasons, and of Leonidas, is infinitely

* Some liberties of a less poetical kind, however, require to be mentioned. In Homer and Virgil's lists of slain warriors, Dryden and Pope have omitted several names which would have rendered English versification dull and tiresome. Several allusions to ancient history and sable have for this reason been abridged. e. g. In the prayer of Gama (Book 6.) the mention of Paul, thou who deliveredst Paul and defendedst him from quicksands and wild waves—is omitted. However excellent in the original, the prayer in English, such is the difference of languages, would lose both its dignity and ardour, if burthened with a farther enumeration. Nor let the critic, if he find the meaning of Camoens in some instances altered, imagine that he has found a blunder in the Translator. He who chuses to see a slight alteration of this kind, will find an instance, which will give him an idea of others, in Can. 8. st. 48. and another in Can. 7. st. 41. It was not to gratify the dull sew, whose greatest pleafure in reading a translation is to fee what the author exactly fays; it was to give a poem that might live in the English language which was the ambition of the Tran-flator. And for the same reason, he has not confined himself to the Portuguese or Spanish pronunciation of proper names. It is ingeniously observed in the Rambler, that Milton, by the introduction of proper. names, often gives great dignity to his verse. Regardless therefore of Spanish pronunciation, the Translator has accented. Granada, Evora, &c. in the manner which feemed to him to give most dignity to English versification. In the word Sofala he has even rejected the authority of Milton, and followed the more fonorous usage of Fanshaw. Thus Sir Richard: " Against Sofala's batter'd fort." And thus Milton: "And Sofala thought Ophir-" Which is the most sonorous there can be no dispute. If the Translator, however, is found to have trespassed against good taste in these liber-ties in the pronunciation of proper names, he will be very willing to acknowledge and correct his error.

Das scyrtes arenosas & ondas feas-"

more tiresome than the sameness of Dryden and Pope. Unnatural distortion of language seems peculiar to blank verse. It is therefore a fure method to spoil the style and expression of youth, who, by the way, are generally its warmest advocates. That rhyme makes the poet walk in shackles is denied. He that feels it so, is forbidden by nature to write in verse; and let him obey the admonition, and presume not to dictate to others from his own feelings—Every advantage of imitative harmony, of running the lines into each other, is enjoyed by rhyme in as high a degree as blank verse. Other arguments in favour of rhyme, are founded on the nature of our language: The repetition of found, unless murdered indeed in the reading, produces a short rest; and this rest fixes the numerousness of the ten fyllables, which in blank heroics, when the lines run into each other, is often totally lost. For the ear feldom perceives, in this case, where the harmony of the line ends. and thence it necessarily becomes prosaic, and is therefore contrary to the genius of our language. And the numerousness thus produced by repetition of found leads even to a greater advantage. Rhyme admits and delights in the most elegant ease both of the natural simplicity and force of expression. But blank heroics, alas! — Yet, peace to its admirers. These obfervations are not obtruded as criticisms, they are only offered as the reasons which induced the Translator to give the English Lusiad that dress, in which he has presented it to the Public.

To his Subscribers the Translator begs leave to offer his most. grateful acknowledgements of the honour they have done him. If the time of his publication exceed the period he at first proposed, the idea he then conceived, and his proposals, are also much exceeded by the Introduction and Notes which he found. necessary to give. As he advanced in his undertaking, new views opened upon him, and to render his work as useful and as complete as he possibly could, was his first care. Nor is his thanks alone due to his Subscribers in general. Many of the most respectable names have honoured his Lusiad with their countenance, and have promoted its success. His list of subscribers will shew the respect that was paid to the opinion of some Gentlemen of the University of Oxford, who have interested themselves in its favour. And that his work may vindicate their good opinion, is not only his first ambition, but.

but, if so happy, the best return he could possibly make them. -The manner in which his Grace the Duke of Buccleugh took the English Lusiad under his patronage, infinitely inhanced the honour of his acceptance-To Governor Johnstone, whose ancestors have been the hereditary patrons of the ancestors of the Translator, he is under every obligation which the warmest zeal to promote the success of his undertaking can possibly confer. To this Gentleman, in a great measure, the appearance of the Lusiad in English is due. - To the Gentlemen of the East India Company, who are his Subscribers, the Translator offers his fingular thanks; and with pleasure he assures them, that their desire to see an Epic Poem, particularly their own, in English, greatly encouraged him in the prosecution of his laborious work-To Thomas Pearson, Esq; of the East India Company's Service, he owes the affiftance of some Portuguese Historians and other books, which have enabled him to elucidate his author. To this Gentleman he also owes the acknowledgement for a numerous list of Subscribers. But these, in themselves, he esteems the least of Major Pearson's favours. The manner of conferring them, and the continuance of his friendly wishes, cannot be repaid by the warmest acknowledgements-To James Boswell, Esq; he confesses many obligations. To the friendship of Mr. Hoole, the elegant Translator of Tasso, he is peculiarly indebted.—And while thus he recollects with pleasure the names of many gentlemen from whom he has received affistance or encouragement; he is happy to be enabled to add Dr. Johnson to the number of those, whose kindness for the man, and good wishes for the Translation, call for his fincerest gratitude. Nor must a tribute to the memory of Dr. Goldsmith be neglected. He saw a part of this version; but he cannot now receive the thanks of the Translator. Neither must another circumstance, which he esteems so flattering an honour, be passed over in silence: Various specimens of this translation have been seen by Portuguese Literati, and the Translator has been favoured with their earnest desire to complete his undertaking. The ingenious Mr. Magellan, of the family of the celebrated Navigator, has been even an enthusiast in promoting its interest. By his means, some of the most respectable literary names of Portugal and of Paris have honoured his lift. From Mr. Magellan and some other Portuguese gentlemen.

tlemen he has received considerable information on various parts of his subject. For these favours, and particularly for the honour they did him, in wishing him to be the Translator of the Poet of their nation, he returns them his most respectful thanks. Yet, though flattered with the approbation of some of those literary names, for whom the Public bear the greatest respect, Though he has introduced to the English Reader a Poem, truly Virgilian, the Translator confesses he has his fears for its fate. His execution—but no apology will supply the defects of elegance and poetical spirit; no apology shall therefore be offered. Yet whatever anxiety the conscience of his inability may give him, he also feels other considerations, which seem to authenticate his fears. We are not, indeed, in the condition of ancient Rome, when, in the declension of her literature, the Latin tongue was despised, and the Greek only admired. Yet, though a masterly treatise in fome branches of literature would immediately receive the approbation due to merit, ere the just reputation of his poetry be fixed, an Author perhaps may be where the applause of the world cannot come. Long after Shakespeare wrote, and thirty years after the Paradise Lost was published, Shaftsbury pronounced that the English Muses were lisping in their cradles. And Temple, a much greater authority in poetical taste, esteems Sidney the greatest of all modern poets. Nor was his neglect of Milton fingular. Even though that immortal Author's reputation be now fixed, I have known a learned gentleman who could not endure a line of the Paradife Lost, who yet, with feeming rapture, would repeat whole pages of Ovid. There is a charm in the found of a language which is not debased by familiar use. And as it was in falling Rome, nothing in his vernacular tongue will be highly esteemed by the Scholar of dull taste. A work which claims poetical merit, while its reputation is unestablished, is beheld, by the great majority, with a cold and a jealous eye. The present age, indeed, is happily auspicious to Science and the Arts; but Poetry is neither the general taste nor the fashionable favourite of these times. Often, in the dispirited hour, have these views obtruded upon the Translator. Whilst he has left his Author upon the table and wandered in the fields, these views have cloathed themselves almost imperceptibly in the stanza and allegory of Spenser. Thus connected with the Translation of Camoens, unfinished as they are, they shall close the Introduction to the English Lusiad.

Hence, vagrant Minstrel, from my thriving farm, Far hence, nor ween to shed thy poison here: My hinds despise thy lyre's ignoble charm; Seek in the Sloggard's bowers thy ill earn'd cheer: There while thy idle chaunting foothes their ear, The noxious thiftle choaks their fickly corn; Their apple boughs, ungraff'd, four wildings bear, And o'er the ill-fenced dales with fleeces torn Unguarded from the fox, their lambkins stray forlorn.

Such ruin withers the neglected foil. When to the fong the ill-starr'd swain attends. And well thy meed repays thy worthless toil: Upon thy houseless head pale want descends In bitter shower: And taunting scorn still rends, And wakes thee trembling from thy golden dream : In vetchy bed, or loathly dungeon ends Thy idled life—What fitter may befeem, Who poisons thus the fount, should drink the poison'd stream.

the table and wanders is x the fields, thefe views have allegory

bnA

And is it thus, the heart-stung Minstrel cry'd,

While indignation shook his silver'd head,

And is it thus, the gross-fed lordling's pride,

And hind's base tongue the gentle Bard upbraid!

And must the holy song be thus repaid

By sun-bask'd ignorance, and chorlish scorn!

While listless drooping in the languid shade

Of cold neglect, the sacred Bard must mourn,

Though in his hallowed breast heaven's purest ardours burn!

Yet how sublime, O Bard, the dread behest,

The awful trust to thee by heaven assign'd!

'Tis thine to humanise the savage breast,

And form in Virtue's mould the youthful mind;

Where lurks the latent spark of generous kind,

'Tis thine to bid the dormant ember blaze:

Heroic rage with gentlest worth combin'd

Wide through the land thy forming power displays.

So spread the olive boughs beneath Dan Phæbus rays.

When Heaven decreed to soothe the seuds that tore
The wolf-eyed Barons, whose unletter'd rage
Spurn'd the fair Muse, Heaven bade on Avon's shore
A Shakespeare rise and soothe the barbarous age:
A Shakespeare rose; the barbarous heats aswage——
At distance due how many bards attend!
Enlarged and liberal from the narrow cage
Of blinded zeal new manners wide extend,
And o'er the generous breast the dews of heaven descend.

And fits it you, ye fons of hallowed power,

To hear, unmoved, the tongue of foorn upbraid

The Muse neglected in her wintry bower,

While proudly flourishing in princely shade

Her younger sisters lift the laurel'd head—

And shall the pencil's boldest mimic rage,

Or softest charms foredoom'd in time to fade,

Shall these be vaunted o'er th' immortal page,

Where passion's living sires burn unimpair'd by age!

And shall the warbled strain or sweetest lyre,
Thrilling the palace roof at night's deep hour;
And shall the nightingales in woodland choir
The voice of heaven in sweeter raptures pour!
Ah no, their song is transient as the slower
Of April morn: In vain the shepherd boy
Sits listning in the silent Autumn bower;
The year no more restores the short-lived joy,
And never more his harp shall Orpheus' hands employ.

Has closed his strain; deep as eternal night
Has o'er Apelles' tints, so bright while-ere,
Drawn her blank curtains—never to the sight
More to be given—But cloath'd in heaven's own light
Homer's bold painting shall immortal shine,
Wide o'er the world shall ever sound the might,
The raptured music of each deathless line,
For death nor time may touch their living soul divine.

And

And what the strain, though Perez swell the note,
High though its rapture, to the Muse of sire!
Yes, what the transient sounds, devoid of thought,
To th' unabated flood of Shakespeare's ire,
Or Milton's giant sway, till time expire
Foredoom'd to live; as heaven's dread energy Unconscious of the bounds of place—

most like out a second will

the state of the state of the posterior

the class that not Charles, that e gailraich shieth haten part principal material backers of the

to a series backet ben an arrange the factor of the lands of the ware, the opposition of it to the melanagel

DISSERTATION.

DISSERTATION

And what the firsin, though Perez facil st

On the Machinery of Tasso's Jerusalem, and Voltaire's Henriade.

Amoens, unheard, unread by the critics. A has been represented to the world as the most extravagant, most absurd of all poets, in the injudicious profane mixture of Christian and Pagan ideas. The gross falfity of this charge we have fully detected. But justice to the reputation of my Author demands fomething farther. If the great Tasso be guilty of the fault injuriously ascribed to Camoens, and if his arch-accuser Voltaire has adopted a machinery infinitely less worthy of the Epic Muse, what must we think of the unjust condemnation of the poet of Portugal! The machinery of the Jerusalem is thus abridged: God sends the angel Gabriel to Godfrey: Gabriel announces him general by the will of heaven, and incites him to a vigorous profecution of the war, to rescue the tomb of Christ from the Infidels. A magician, an apostate Christian, who could alarm Pluto in his own regions, and who still mixed some Christian rites with his profane incantations, advises Aladine king of Jerusalem to seize a statue of the Virgin and place it in his mosque, af-furing him, that while it continued there, his spells should protect the city. The image is accordingly placed in the mosque, contrary to Mohammedan manners, from whence it miraculously disappears. The war commences. The foe of man, afterwards named Pluto, calls a council of the infernal powers. Polypheme, Gorgon, Cerberus, &c. are here. Pluto relates his own fall from heaven, the birth of Christ, Christ's descent into hell, his rescue of captive souls; and then proposes to destroy the Christian army, particularly by the snares of love. Armida, a most beautiful enchantress, is sent by her uncle, the king of Damascus, who is also a magician, to delude the Christian chiefs. She arrives at the camp; pretends to be a dethroned princes, and begs affistance. The flower of the Christian warriors are eager to go with her: ten are appointed by lot, and many others follow her by stealth.

Sin ne la regia sua Pluton spaventa-

Thefe, like Circe, she enchants, and turns them into fishes. Beelzebub and Alccto are alternately introduced, as exciting the Infil dels to treachery. God now fends the archangel Michael to drive the dæmons from the battle. The magician Ismeno excites the Soldan Solyman against the Christians, and conveys him in an enchanted chariot to Jerusalem. The dæmons, who had been driven by Michael to Acheron, are recalled by Ismeno, and ordered to take possession of a forest, from whence it was necessary for the Christians to cut timber to carry on the seige. Tancred, terrified by apparitions. defifts from his attempt to cut down the forest. The hermit Peter pronounces that this fervice was decreed for Rinaldo, who is in the power of the enchantress Armida. Peter informs Ubald and Charles, that a Christian magician at Ascalon will assist them to relieve the hero from her inchantment. The episode of Armida, abounding in poetry, is now introduced. Rinaldo is relieved, and the enchanted forest by him cut down. The poem now draws to the hurry of conclusion. The wall of Jerusalem is affailed; Ifmeno and two other magicians, in defence of the Infidels, endeavour to change the course of nature with their inchantments,

Yes, what the transfent founds,

Or Milton's grant Iway .

Ritentar volle l'arti sue fallaci Per ssorzar la natura —

And the arch-angel Michael appears to Godfrey, to whom he shews the souls of the Christian heroes who had fallen in the war still fighting under his banners, and the host of heaven ready to oppose the enemy. The assault is successful. The Insidel chiefs are killed by different Christian heroes. Armida, who sought in the Egyptian army, submits to Rinaldo, and Godfrey is completely vistorious

Such is the machinery of a poem, univerfally and justly admired Yet whatever praise is due to the grandeur of Gothic inchantment, the opposition of it to the arch-angel Michael, the immediate messenger of God, carries in it a fomething which must difplease. No popular belief of the power of magic will palliate the difgust of the sensible reader. Had the hermit Peter, who is represented as a prophet, worked miracles, fuch as abound in the monkish legends; these, the objects of firm popular belief, with greater propriety and even more poetry might have opposed the power of infernal magicians. But as the machinery stands in Tasso, that of Camoens, which is purely the well known allegory of poetry, is infinitely less culpable in the mixture of ideas. . As the machinery of the Henriade cannot be traced without a view of the whole action of the poem, a diffection of the whole shall be accurately given. It has been faid, that the French language is incapable of Epic dignity. The Henriade proves the justice of this observation. The Reader, who is acquainted with Virgil, must perceive the miserable comparative poverty of the Henriade; he will also observe, that the following citations are made in examination. of the machinery, and not selected with a view to the want of Epic dignity.

The action of the Henriade is founded on French history. Soon after the horrid massacre of Paris, an association against the protestants was formed under the Duke of Guise. The power of this association, called the Holy League, began to give uneasiness to Henry III. a weak dissipated prince, and Guise, by his order, was assaffinated. The League, however, became more formidable, and Henry was driven from his capital. He implored the assistance of his former enemy, Henry of Navarre, the head of the protestant party. While the two kings assailed Paris, Henry III. was stabbed by a young friar, and Henry of Navarre, the legal heir of the crown, con-tinued the siege. Paris, though reduced to the most dreadful extremities of famine, still held out, till Henry, perceiving the unalterable hatred which the League bore to his religion, abjured the protestant doctrine, and Paris opened her gates and received him with joy. And thus, fays Voltaire, in his English introduction to the Henriade, (omitted in his French copies) " What his valour and mag-" nanimity could never bring about, was " eafily obtained by going to mass, and by " receiving absolution of the Pope."

However bold it may feem to condemn this subject as unworthy of the Epic Muse, there needs no argument to prove it infinitely inferior to that of the Lufiad. In dignity and conduct Camoens is every where Virgilian: Voltaire shall speak for himself. The state of France, at the commencement of the action, is thus described:

Les loix étaient sans sorce, et les droits consondus, Ou plutôt en effet Valois ne régnait plus—— On voyait dans Paris la Discorde inhumaine Excitant aux combats, & la Lique & Mayene— Ce monstre impétueux, sanguinaire, instexible, De ses propres sujets est l'ennemi terrible.

In the machinery which is now introduced, the foul of St, Louis acts the part of Venus in the Enead. From the height of the heavens he beholds and protects Henry of Navarre, but he conceals the arm which he fpreads to guard him, left the hero, too fure of victory, and with lefs danger, should acquire lefs glory. The lines are these: frigid indeed!

Le Père de Bourbons, du sein des immortels, Louïs, sixait sur lui ses regards paternels— Mais Henri s'avançait vers sa grandeur supréme, Par des chemins secrets, inconnus a lui meme: Louïs du baut de cieux lui prétait son appui; Mais il cachait le bras qu'il étendait pour lui, De peur que ce béros, trop sur de sa victoire, Avec moins de danger n'eut acquis moins de gloire.

Having thus introduced the reader to the leading personage of the machinery, Paris is besieged by the two kings, we are told, and the dæmon of carnage has carried his rage from sea to sea. The action now commences, Henry III. of the house of Valois, deplores his situation to Henry of Navarre, tells him that the papal thunders are issued against him, and that Spain is about to fend auxiliaries to the League. He therefore entreats him to go to England to solicit an army to assist them.

Henry then fails from Dieppe.

L'impétueux Borée, enchaîné dans les airs, Au fouste de Zéphyre abandonnoit les mers.

Then comes a florm, in very common place description, in which Henry thought of nothing but the evils of his country;

Ne songe en ce danger qu'aux maux de sa patrie.

Then the God of the Universe commands the storm to carry the vessel to the isle of Jersey. Here the hero lands and finds a venerable old man, who sought peace far from the court, loin de la cour, and God, it feems, had fent Wisdom to open the book of Fate to this same hermit;

Ce Dieu qu'il adorait, prit soin de sa vieillesse, Il sit dans son désert descendre la Sagesse; Et prodigue envers hu de ses tresors divins, Il ouvrit a ses yieux le livre de Destins.

And here Mornay, the Calvinist friend of Henry, who Prétait au Calvinisme un appui redoutableand the hermit, hold a discourse upon theology, in which the old prophet execrates Calvinism, and foretells, that a worship so new, could not always continue;

Un culte si nouveau ne peut durer toujours. Des caprices de l'homme il a tiré son être : On le verra périr ainsi qu'on la vû naître.

The hermit then prophesies, that Henry should turn papist and be king. An idle declamation on the English, who are unsit either to be slaves or freemen,

Qui ne peut ni servir, ni vivre en liberté-and the character of Elizabeth, who chained destiny at her feet, and assonished the world with the eclat of her reign,

Une femme à ses pieds enchaînant les destins, De l'éclat de son règne étonnait les bumains - conclude the interview with the hermit of Jersey; an episode of no use in the conduct of the poem, and a dull imitation of the part acted by the hermit Peter in Tasso. What strange fancy, says Voltaire in his English critique on The Jerusalem, to send Ubaldo and his companion to an holy conjurer." Yet this part in Tasso is not only conducted in the true spirit of the grand machinery of Gothic enchantment, a machinery proper to the age of his heroes, but is also intimately connected with the catasstrophe of the poem. But in no circumstance does this defence of Tasso plead for Voltaire.

Henry is now introduced to the queen of England, who with impatience demands an account of the troubles of France:

Elizabeth alors avec impatience, Demande le récit des troubles de la France, Veut savoir quels resorts, & quel enchaînement Ont produit dans Paris un si grand changement.

The massacre of Paris is now related, with feveral digressive observations on tyranny, without either force or novelty, and after a long tite à tête on laws and liberty, &c. &c. Elizabeth allows the Earl of Essex and a thousand English youth to accompany Henry, whom she dismisses in the true spirit of petit maiterism. Of her troops, she says;

Au milieu des combats vous les verrez courir Plus pour vous imiter que pour vous secourir. Formés par votre exemple au grand art de la guerre,

Ils apprendront sous vous à servir l'Angleterre-

i. e. In the midst of battles you shall see them hasten more to imitate you than to help you. Formed by your example in the great art of war, they shall learn under you to serve England." And himself she politely compliments, as only worthy to talk of himself;

Vous seul pouvez parler dignement de vous-même.

And thus ends in mere bagatelle the embassy which ought to have been of the utmost importance throughout the Poem. The embassy of king Latinus to Diomed, and the journey of Eneas to king Evander, are with admirable art worked into the great action of the Eneid. The refusal of Diomed to make war against Eneas, greatly heightens the character of the hero. The absence and return of Eneas are both most happily interesting, and the fate of his new friend and auxiliary, the fon of Evander, gives the highest importance to the journey of the hero, by constituting a principal part of the action and catastrophe of the Eneid. In the Henriade every thing is different. The hero leaves the siege of Paris, hears the effusions of monkish bigotry poured forth by a hermit at the isle of Jersey, comes. to London, and in the true style of coffeehouse politicians, has a long talk with queen Elizabeth. The earl of Essex, it is true,. and a thousand of the English youth accompany him to France; but there is not one circumstance performed by them, which even gives a colour of importance to this embally of the hero of the Henriade. In his first editions, Voltaire twice mentions the English, but nothing particular is ascribed to them: and so little did he regard the spirit of Virgil in the part of Pallas, that in-his last edition, the English auxiliaries are only once mentioned as in battle, and that in a manner utterly uninteresting, of noconsequence to the conduct of the poem.

Henry's

can possibly guess, St. Louis sends Sleep and Hope to comfort him. The Saint appears to him in a dream, crowns him, and placeing him beside himself in a chariot of light, they traverse the heavens together;

Iouïs en ce moment prenant fon diadéme Sur le front du wainqueur il le posa lui-meme : — L'un & l'autre à ces mots dans un char de sumière Des Cieux en un moment traversent la carrière.

Then passing the sun we have a view of the worlds around him, according to the Newtonian system, in poetical colouring a very poor imitation of the Ptolemaic, as described in Camoens. Henry passes,

A des mondes divers autour de lui flottans-

Then they come to space,

Où la matière nage, & que Dieu seul embrasse, Sont de Soleils sans nombre, & des mondes sans sin.

He then comes, where the ghosts of Brahmins, Bonzes, Monks, wild Americans and Mohammedans, wait the hour of judgment. Here he makes a speech of twelve lines on the salvation of Heathens and Christians. A voice, which shakes the heavens and makes the universe groan, answers from the throne of God. Henry is then carried by a whirlwind to an abode, the abominable image of Chaos;

Vers un séjour informe, aride, affreux, sauvage, De l'antique Cahos aboninable image.

Hell is now described, where they see the assassing Clement. Then comes an Elyzium, where St. Louis presides over Charlemagne and other kings and heroes of France. The palace of Destiny then opens its hundred brass gates, and Henry is reproved by St. Louis. his guide, for being a protestant. And after having seen some of the great men of France, who were then unborn, the hero awakes; and thus closes a most service uninventive imitation of the fixth Eneid. Yet, uninventive as it is, original in nothing but the extravagance about the salvation of Bonzes and Bramins, Marmontel has not scrupled to pronounce it, "vaut feul toute Plliade, worth alone all the Iliad."

Hitherto has the Henriade been without Liaifon. The real action has, like a wounded fnake, dragg'd its flow length along. But fome business is now resumed. The eighth book opens with the consusion of the Leaguers, who neither durst degrade nor crown Mayenne; when Discorde, bursting from a cloud, appears in a luminous chariot, and inspires their courage;

La Discorde à l'instant entr'ouvrant une nue, Sur un char lumineux se présente a leur vue, Courage, leur dit elle———

The Spaniards under Egmont, and the Leaguers under Mayenne prepare for war. Henry advances to the plains of Ivry. Discorde blows her infernal trumpet to animate the Leaguers, Elle vole à leur tête, et sa bouche satale Fait retentir au loin sa trompette insernale. Par ces sons trop connus d'Aumale est excité, Aussi prompt que le trait dans les airs emporté.

This battle is well described, but without originality. Mayenne and the Leaguers are descated. St. Louis, surrounded with the souls of the other Bourbons, from the height of the firmament observes how Henry will use his victory,

Vint contempler Henri dans ce fameux moment.

and the result of the battle is like a newspaper in verse. Discorde goes now to find out Love. And the ninth book opens with a description of his temple. A description, where one might have expected original poetry from the genius of Voltaire. But every thing is contrary here. The descriptive part is most backneyed common place; every expression of it may be selected from Cowley's poems. Darts, stames, sighs, tears, rapture and misery, are hustled together, and then strung in verse without gradation, without novelty. The reader is entreated

" In the edition of London, 1727, Voltaire feems to have imitated the celestial sphere of Camoens. He fends his here,

Parmi ses tourbillons, que d'une main féconde Disposa l'Eternel au premier jour du monde, Est un globe élevé dans le faîte des cieux Dont l'éclat se dérobe à nos prosanes yeux,

But these whirlwinds and the globe where the Most High ereates the splrits, and whither they are returned by death, are omitted in the latter editions. The citations made in this Dissertation are taken from the Geneva edition of 1768, which was published under Voltaire's own inspection.

entreated to compare the Temple of Love in Dryden's Palemon and Arcite with that in the Henriade; and he is promifed that he will find them as different as mere ver-fification is from real poetry. But to return to the fable of the Henriade. Love, who by the bye is Difcord's brother, makes a long speech about Hercules and Cleopatra. He then slies over Troy, and other places most famous in the classics, and arrives at last at Ivry. He beholds the camp as his prey, and feels an inhuman joy,

L' Amour fent à sa vue une joie inbumaine.

In imitation of Virgil, a storm is raised, which drives Henry to the Chateau of the celebrated Madam D'Estrée, where his virtue abandons him, and his intoxicated foul loves, fees, hears, and knows nothing but d'Estrée." 'The danger of d'Estrée's virtue, a poor subaltern's daughter, is thus pompously bewailed:

Sa viertu l'abandonne, & son ame enywrée N'aime, ne woit, n'entend, ne connaît que d'Estrée.

Contreun pouvoir si grandqu'eût pû faire d'Estrée? Par un charme indomtable elle était attirée; Elle avait à combattre, en ce sunesse jour, Sa jeunesse, son cœur, un Héros, & l'Amour!

i. e. Against so great power what could d'Estrée do? By an irresistible charm she was attracted; in that satal day she had to combat her youth, her heart, a hero, and Love!

The French, indeed, may admire this. No nation but themselves, however, could bear fuch impertinence. What would be thought of an English writer, who would describe the first meeting of Charles II. and Nell Gwynne, or Louis XV. and Pompadour, as an incident worthy of Epic dignity? The episode of Dido affords no desence for this parody upon it. A fugitive prince, married to the queen of a powerful state, is as different in Epic grandeur from the amour of Henry with a Subaltern's daughter, as are the manners of the age of Eneas from those of the days of the French Hero; as different as the true dignity of Virgil is from the French complaifance and mock dignity of Madam d'Estrée. During the amour of Henry all is in danger; the camp is all licentiousness,

Où du foldat voinqueur s'emporte l'infolence-

But St. Louis fends the genius of France to put this to rights. The genius employs Mornay, the Calvinift, to rescue Henry from the snares of Love. And this, says the poet, was to instruct us that reason was often sufficient to guide us, and thus Marcus Aurelius and Plato are a disgrace to Christians;

Il's'addresse a Mornay, c'était pour nous instruire, Que souvent la raison sussit à nous conduire; Ainsi qu'elle guida chez des peuples Payens Marc-Auréle, ou Platon, la honte des Chrétiens.

Love, however, is very angry at this choice, but Mornay despises his rage and his charms,

Mais Mornay méprifait sa colère, & ses charmes.

Discorde, in the meanwhile, irritates the Leaguers. Mornay finds the king and his mistress. The king, ashamed, leaves d'Estrée and attacks Paris. The battle of Ivry, the best part of the whole poem, is now described, but is as like Tasso, as the closest imitations of Virgil resemble Homer. In book X. Henry returns to the siege, is just on the point of taking the city, when the angel of France stops him, Quand l'Ange de la France, appaisant son couroux, Retint son bras wainqueur, & suspendit ses coups.

A duel, in imitation of Homer, Virgil and Tasso, between d'Aumale and Turenne, is now described. This is greatly admired in France, and is perhaps the first of the Henriade in true merit; but it is also a close copy, and much inserior to the duels of Tasso. A black cloud, during this combat, vomits the monsters of hell over Paris, Cependant sur Paris s'élevait un nuage, Qui semblait apporter le tonnerre & l'orage; Ses stancs noirs & brulans tout-à-coup entr'ouverts, Vomissent dans ces lieux les monstres des Ensers.

Fanaticism, Discorde, and dark Politique with salse heart and squint cyc,

La sombre Politique, au cœur faux, & l'æil louche-And the dæmon of battles,

Dieux eny vrés de sang, Dieux dignes des Liqueurs-all fly to the aid of d'Aumale. But the height of the heavens opens, and an Angel descends on the throne of the air, with the olive of peace in one hand, and the sword of God's vengeance in the other;

Voilà qu'au même instant, du baut de cieux ouverts, Un Ange est descendu sur le trône des airs,

The

DISSERTATION.

The infernal monsters are difmayed; then

Paris, le Roi, l'Armée, & l'Enfer, & les Cieux, Sur ce combas illustre avaient sixé les yeux—

Paris, the king, the army, hell and heaven fix their eyes on the illustrious fight." d'Aumale falls, the monsters of hell groan, and voices are heard in the air,

Ces lugubres accens dans les airs s'entendirentacknowledging that their reign is past. The army of Henry demand leave to assail the city, but St. Louis will not allow it, and Henry acts upon a fentiment very unworthy of an Epic poem. He chuses rather to reduce the city by famine, as a method more powerful than his arms, Il crut que fans affauts, fans combats, fans allarmes, La difette & la faim, plus fortes que fes armes, Lui livreraient fans peinc un peuple inanimé.

The horrors of famine are now described in lively colours, but too shocking to incite any one to a second reading. The besieged are willing to submit, and Henry promises forgiveness and mercy. But the priests tell them that they are the soldiers of God, and that a tyrant heretic will not keep his word. And by the priests they are ordered to defend their temples from his heresy, Sauvons nos temples faints de son culte bérétique.

What now is to be done? The faction are again outrageous, and the befieged may eat one another, nay, as both history and the poem tell us, may open the graves in the church-yards for food ‡; but St. Louis will not allow Henry to take the city by force. What must be done in this most admirable dignus vindice nodus?

why truly St. Louis must take the business upon himself. The throne of God is now described in twenty-four lines, and here St. Louis approaches,

Le père de Bourbons a ses yeux se présente, Et lui parle en ces mots d'une voix gemissante. In his speech he tells the Almighty, that if the French disobeyed the laws of heaven, it was on purpose to obey them; for that his son, the grand Henri, their lawful king, was an heretic. His conversion is therefore implored. Of this, the Eternal, by a word of his mouth, assures St. Louis,

Par un mot de sa bouche il daigna l'affurer.

Truth then descends from the height of the heavens to the hero's tents,

Dans les tentes du Roi, descend du haut des cieux.

Henry then turns Roman Catholic, and believes in the doctrine of Transubstantiation; for Truth,

-lui découvre un Dieu sous un pain, qui n'est plus.

Then St. Louis, with an olive bough in his hand, descends from the height of the heavens, and leads Henry to the ramparts of Paris, which open at his call, and receive him in the name of God:

Louis dans ce moment, qui comble ses soubaits, Louis tenant en main l'olive de la paix, Descend du baut du Cieux vers les l'éros qu'il aime; Aux remparts de Paris il le conduit lui-même; Les remparts ébranlés s'entr'ouvrent à sa voix; Il entre au nom de Dieu, qui fait regner les Rois.

And thus ends the Henriade; a poem in every respect unworthy of the name of Epic.

Every reader who has an ear must perceive how distant from the dignity of Virgil are French heroics, even in the hands of Voltaire. The conduct of the fable is not Epic, for it is not One. The catastrophe has not the least dependance upon the long episode of the journey to England, though this episode is almost one third of the whole poem. In the action there is no gradation. Henry vanquishes his soes, but St. Louis will not allow him to reap the fruits of victory. Nothing therefore results from the real action, but contrary to Homer and Virgil, Allis lest to the machinery. After the long tale which Henry tells Elizabeth, the real action or fable would fill but a sew pages; five parts of six

† They ground the bones of the dead into a flour, of which they made bread.

. The old monkish rhymes of friar Baston,

De planclu cudo metrum cum carmine nudo, Rifam retrudo, cum tali themate ludo-in harmony and energy are hardly inferior to many passages of the Henriade. But this perhaps is not the fault of Voltaire; but of the language.

are machinery, a machinery the most ridiculous and puerile ever adopted by the heroes of the Lutrin. If any French critic be offended at this, let him renounce his admiration of Boileau, by whom the machinery of the Henriade, as already observed, is as severely condemned, as if he had written his celebrated critique on Epic poetry on purpose to condemn it. However superior Voltaire may be in the other walks of poetry, certain it is, no originality, no strength of colouring. Shines in the Henriade. The following lines, said of Mornay, are admired in France as the finest sublime, Mais il ne permet pas à ses slouques mains De se soutller du sang des malheureux humains. De son Roi seulement son ame est occupée: Pour sa désense seule il a tiré l'épée; Et son rare courage, ennemi des combats, Sait affronter la mort, & ne la donne pas.

But furely that cannot be the true fublime which contains the true abfurd. Mornay will not stain his hands with human blood. He is only anxious to defend his king, for his defence only he draws his fword. "His rare courage, enemy to battles, knows how to dare death but not to give it;" that is, Mornay is earnest to defend his king, hut he will kill no body in his defence. In the heat of battle he only parries the fwords which attack him. The enemy may return to the charge in a moment; three or four fwords may attack the king a: a time, but Mornay will not lessen their number or prevent a fecond attack. A most excellent method, indeed, to defend one's fovereign! Yet fuch is the most admired beauty in the Henriade ! !--- Mr. Locke was highly pleased with the epic poems of Blackmore: And there are a race of critics, of Mr.

Locke's taste, who admire the Henriade, who call it All Sense, who are pleased with Discorde in her chariot, and La Politique, sometimes in one monk's frock, and sometimes in another, the very Dutch style of painting; but who yet decry the grand perfonnifications of Milton's angels, as the most absurd and bizarre extravagance. Nor is their resemblance to Locke's taste less remarkable, than the likeness between Blackmore's Arthurs and the Henriade. That sense which is admired in the French poem, abounds in the Arthurs. In their machinery of Angels and Souls is a striking likeness; the fame strain of common place description, the same round of servile imitations, the same idle pretences to moderation in theology, and fame want of poetical novelty, characterise the Henriade and the Ten epic poems of Blackmore. To conslitute a poem worthy of the name of Epic in the strictest and highest sense, some grand characteristics of subject and conduct, peculiarly its own, are absolutely necessary. Of all the moderns, Camoens and Milton have alone attained this grand peculiarity in an eminent degree. Tasso has something of it, but Voltatre has not the least claim to this essential constituent of a real Epic. In a word, let our coldblooded critics admire him as they please, the total want of originality, both in the circumstances and poetical colouring, the want of that connection and gradation necessary to the Epic unity; the deficiency of grandeur, the idle spirit of theological nibbling about Plato. Bramins, and Bonzes, which runs through the whole; and fuch a machinery, all combine to vindicate the man who is bold enough to pronounce that France has as yet no Epic poem, though Voltaire has written the Henriade.

† Voltaire informs us, that the judicious Crities, with whom France abounds, despise the Pandæmonium of Milton, and cannot bear his Death and Sin. He tells us that we know not what angels are, and therefore cannot be interested for them; and that it is absurd to arm spirits with swords, for they cannot hurt each other with them. For these reasons, he says, the battle of the angels appears to the judicious French crities as vold of taste, verisimilitude, or reason.—But let the reputation of Voltaire be as high as It will, who can forbear to call this criticism an utter ignorance of the spirit of poetry. It is true we know neither the form nor the arms of an angel. But what then, in the name of all the Muses? Will not true poetry personnify them in the manner of a Milton? Must Discorde have a trumpet and ride about in a chariot; and must not Milton arm a warrior angel with a fword! Must the passions be personnified, and must not an angel be represented as the most graceful figure? But this needs no enforcement—That nation which can condemn the personnifications of Milton, and admire those of the Henriade, highly merit the character which Voltaire tells us (Genev. Edit. vol. 1. p. 314.) Monsteur Malezieux, in conversation with himself, gave them—"Les Français n'ont pas la tête épique—The French have not heads for Epie Poetry."

L U S I A D.

BOOK I

RMS and the Heroes, who from Lisbon's shore, Thro' Seas b where sail was never spread before, Beyond where Ceylon lifts her spicy breast, And waves her woods above the watery waste, a The Lusiad; in the original, Os Lusiadas, The Lusiads, from the Latin name of Portugal, derived from Lusus or Lysas, the companion of Bacchus in his travels, and who settled a colony in Lusiania. See Plin. I. iii. c. I.

Plin. 1. iii. c. 1.

b Thro' Seas where fail was never spread before.—M. Duperron de Castera, who has given a French prose translation, or rather paraphrase of the Lusiad, has a long note on this passage, which he tells us, must not be understood literally. Our author, he says, could not be ignorant that the African and Indian Oceans had been navigated before the times of the Portuguese. The Phoenicians whose sleets passed the straits of Gibraltar, made frequent voyages in these seas, though they carefully concealed the course of their navigation that other nations might not become partakers of their lucrative trassec. It is certain that Solomon, and Hiram king of Tyre, sent ships to the East by the Red Sea. It is also certain that Hanno a Carthaginian captain made a voyage round the whole coast of Africa, as is evident from the history of the expedition, written by himself in the Punic language; a Greek translation of which is now extant. Besides,

With prowess more than human forc'd their way

To the fair kingdoms of the rising day:

What wars they wag'd, what seas, what dangers past,

What glorious Empire crown'd their toils at last,

Vent'rous I sing, on soaring pinions borne,

'And all my Country's wars the song adorn;

sides, Pliny, Pomponius Mela, Ptolomy and Strabo, assure us, that Mozambie and the adjacent islands and some parts of India were known to the Romans: and these words of Macrobius, Sed nec monstruosis carnibus abstinctis, inserentes poculis testiculos Castorum et venenata corpora Viperarum; quibus admisectis quidquid India nutrit, sufficiently prove that they carried on a considerable trassic with the East. From all which, says M. Castera, we may conclude that the Portuguese were rather the Restorers than the Discoverers of the navigation to the Indies.

In this first book, and throughout the whole Poem, Camoens frequently describes his Heroes as passing through seas which had never before been navigated; and Que só dos seyos socas se navega. Where but Sea-monsters cut the waves before.

That this supposition afforded our author a number of poetical images, and adds a folemn grandeur to his subject, might perhaps with M. Castera be esteemed a sufficient apology for the poetical licence in such a vio-lation of historical truth. Yet whatever li-berties an Epic or Tragic Poet may com-mendably take in embellishing the actions of his heroes, an affertion relating to the scene where his Poem opens, if false, must be equally ridiculous as to call Vespasian the first who had ever assumed the title of Cefar. But it will be found that Camoens has not fallen into fuch abfurdity. The Poem opens with a description of the Lusitanian fleet, after having doubled the Cape of Hope, driving about in the great Ethiopian Ocean, so far from land that it required the care of the Gods to conduct it to fome hospitable share. Therefore, though it is certain that the Phænicians passed the Ne plus ultra of the ancients; though it is probable they traded on the coast of Cornwall, and the isles of Scilly; though there is some reason to believe that the Madeiras and Carribees were known to them; and though it has been supposed that some of their ships might have been driven by storm to the Brazils or North-America; yet there is not the least foundation in history to suppose that they traded to the Indies by the Cape of Good Hope. There is rather a demonstration of the contrary; for it is certain they carried on their traffic with the East, by a much nearer and fafer way, by the two ports of Elath and Eziongeber on the Red Sea. Neither is it known in what particular part, whether in the Persian gulph, or in the Indian Ocean, the Tarshish and Ophir of the ancients are fituated. Though it is certain that Hanno doubled the Cape of Good Hope, it is also equally certain that his voyage was merely a coasting one, like that of Nearchus in Alexander's time, and that he never ventured into the great Ocean, or went fo far as Gama. The citation from Macrobius proves nothing at all relative to the point in question, for it is certain that the Romans received the Merchandise of India by the way of Syria and the Mediterranean, in the same manner as the Venetians imported the commodities of the East from Alexandria before the difcoveries of the Portuguese. It remains, therefore, that Gama, who failed by the Compass, after having gone further than his cotemporary Bartholomew Diaz, was literally the first who ever spread fail in the great foutherr. Ocean, and that the Portuguese were not the Restorers, but literally the Discoverers of the present rout of Navigation to the East Indies.

"And all my Country's quars.—He interweaves artfully the history of Portugal.—Voltaire.

What

What Kings, what Heroes of my native land
Thunder'd on Asia's and on Afric's strand:
Illustrious shades, who levell'd in the dust
The idol-temples and the shrines of lust;
And where, erewhile, foul demons were rever'd,
To Holy Faith unnumber'd altars rear'd:
Illustrious names, with deathless laurels crown'd,
While time rolls on in every clime renown'd!

Let Fame with wonder name the Greek no more,
What lands he saw, what toils at sea he bore;
Nor more the Trojan's wandering voyage boast,
What storms he brav'd, how driven on many a coast:

d To Holy Faith unnumber'd altars rear'd. -In no period of History does Human Nature appear with more shocking, more diabolical features than in the wars of Cortez, and the Spanish Conquerors of South America. To the immortal honour of the Portuguese Discoverers, their conduct was in every respect the reverse. To establish a traffic equally advantageous to the natives as to themselves, was the motive on which they acted; the strictest honour, and that humanity which is ever inseparable from true bravery, presided over their transactions; nor did they ever proceed to hostilities till provoked, either by the open violence or by the perfidy of the Natives. Their honour was admired, and their friendship courted by the Indian Princes. To mention no more, the name of Gama was dear to them, and the great Albuquerque was beloved as a father, and his memory honoured with every token of affection and respect by the people and princes of India, though his conquests in the East were so great, that his Countrymen, without offering any injury to the fame of Alexander, compared him to that renowned Hero. It was owing to this spirit of honour and humanity, which in the heroical days of Portugal characterised that nation, that the religion of the Portuguese was eagerly embraced by many kings and provinces of Africa and India; while the Mexicans with manly disdain rejected the faith of the Spaniards, professing they would rather go to hell to escape these cruel Tyrants, than go to heaven, where they were told, they would meet them. Zeal for the Christian religion was esteemed, at the time of the Portuguese grandeur, as the most cardinal Virtue, and to propagate Christianity and extirpate Mohammedism were the most certain proofs of that zeal. In all their expeditions this was professedly a principal motive of the Lusitanian Monarchs, and Camoëns understood the nature of Epic poetry too well to omit, That the design of his Hero was to divulge the Law of heaven, a circumstance which gives a noble air of importance to his Subject. To take notice of the vast success of the Portuguese in propagating their religion, a success so different from that of our modern missionaries, is a necessary Elucidation of this, and of several other passages of the Lusiad.

No more let Rome exult in Trajan's name,
Nor eastern conquests Ammon's pride proclaim;
A nobler Hero's deeds demand my lays
Than e'er adorn'd the song of ancient days,
Illustrious Gama, whom the waves obey'd,
And whose dread sword the sate of Empire sway'd.

And you, fair Nymphs of Tagus, parent stream, If e'er your meadows were my pastoral theme, While you have listen'd, and by moonshine seen My footsteps wander o'er your banks of green, O come auspicious, and the song inspire With all the boldness of your Hero's sire: Deep and majestic let the numbers flow, And, rapt to heaven, with ardent sury glow, Unlike the verse that speaks the lover's grief, When heaving sighs afford their soft relief, And humble reeds bewail the shepherd's pain: But like the warlike trumpet be the strain To rouse the Hero's rage, and far around, With equal powers, your warriors' deeds resound.

And thou, 'O born the pledge of happier days, To guard our freedom and our glories raife, like Virgil's Pollio, had not the happiness to fulfil the prophecy. His endowments and enterprising genius promised indeed a glorious reign. Ambitious of military laurels,

King Sebastian, who came to the throne in his minority. Though the warm imagination of Camoens anticipated the praises of the suture Hero, the young monarch,

Given to the world to spread religion's sway,

And pour o'er many a land the mental day,

Thy future honours on thy shield behold,

The cross, and victor's wreath, embost in gold:

he led a powerful army into Africa, on purpose to replace Muley Hamet on the throne of Morocco, from which he had been deposed by Muley Molucco. On the 4th of August, 1578, in the 25th year of his age, he gave battle to the Usurper on the plains of Alcazar. This was that memorable engagement, to which the Moorish Emperor, extremely weakened by fickness, was carried in his litter. By the impetuosity of the attack, the first line of the Moorish infantry was broken, and the second disordered. Muley Molucco on this mounted his horse, drew his fabre, and would have put himfelf at the head of his troops, but was prevented by his attendants. On this act of violence, his emotion of mind was fo great that he fell from his horse, and one of his guards having caught him in his arms, conveyed him to his litter, where, putting his finger on his lips to enjoin them silence, he immediately expired. Hamet Taba stood by the curtains of the carriage, opened them from time to time, and gave out orders as if he had received them from the Emperor. Victory declared for the Moors, and the defeat of the Portuguese was so total, that not above fifty of their whole army escaped. Hieron de Mendoça, and Sebastian de Mesa relate, that Don Sebastian, after having two horses killed under him, was surrounded and taken; but the party who had secured him quarrelling among themselves whose pri-foner he was, a Moorish officer rode up and firuck the King a blow over the right eye which brought him to the ground; when, defpairing of ranfom, the others killed him. Faria y Sousa, an exact and judicious historian reports, that Lewis de Brito meeting the King with the royal standard wrapped round him, Sebassian cried out, "Hold it "fast, let us die upon it." Brito affirmed, that after he himself was taken prisoner, he faw the King at a distance unpursued. Don Lewis de Lima afterwards met him making towards the river; and this, fays the hiftorian, was the last time he was ever seen alive. About twenty years after this fatal defeat there appeared a stranger at Venice, who called himself Schassian, King of Portugal, whom he so perfectly resembled, that the Portuguese of that city acknowledged him for their Sovereign. Philip II. of Spain was now Master of the crown and kingdom of Portugal. His ambassador at Venice charged this stranger with many attrocious crimes, and had interest to get him apprehended and thrown into prison as an impostor. He underwent twenty-eight examinations before a committee of the nobles, in which he clearly acquitted himself of all the crimes that had been laid to his charge; he gave a distinct account of the manner in which he had passed his time from the fatal defeat at Alcazar. It was objected, that the successor of Muley Molucco fent a corps to Portugal which had been owned as that of the King by the Portuguese nobility who survived the battle. To this he replied, that his valet de chambre had produced that body to facilitate his escape, and that the nobility acted upon the same motive, and Mesa and Baena confefs, that some of the nobility, after their return to Portugal, acknowledged, that the corps was so disfigured with wounds that it was impessible to know it. He shewed natural marks on his body, which many remembered on the person of the King whose name he assumed. He entered into a minute detail of the transactions that had passed between himself and the republic, and mentioned the fecrets of feveral converfations with the Venetian ambassadors in the palace of Lisbon. The Committee were aftonished, and shewed no disposition to de-clare him an Impostor; the Senate however resused to discuss the great point, unless requested by some Prince or State in alliance with them. This generous part was performed by the Prince of Orange, and an

At thy commanding frown we trust to see,

The Turk and Arab bend the suppliant knee:

Beneath the morn, dread King, thine Empire lies,

When midnight veils thy Lusitanian skies;

And when descending in the western main

The sun still rises on thy lengthening reign:

examination was made with great folemnity, but no decision followed, only the Senate fet him at liberty, and ordered him to depart their dominions in three days. In his flight he fell into the hands of the Spaniards, who conducted him to Naples, where they treated him with the most barbarous indignities. After they had often exposed him, mounted on an afs, to the cruel infults of the brutal mob, he was shipped on board a galley as a flave. He was then carried to St. Lucar, from thence to a castle in the heart of Castile, and never was heard of more. The firmness of his behaviour, his fingular modesty and heroical patience, are mentioned with admiration by Le Clede. To the last he maintained the truth of his affertions; a word never flipt from his lips which might countenance the charge of Imposture, or justify the cruelty of his persecutors. All Europe were aftonished at the Ministry of Spain, who, by their method of conducting it, had made an affair fo little to their credit, the topic of general conver-fation; and their affertion, that the unhappy sufferer was a magician, was looked upon as a tacit acknowledgement of the truth of his pretensions.

Fortugal, when Camoens wrote his Lufiad, was at the zenith of its power and splendor. The glorious successes which had attended the arms of the Portuguese in Africa, had gained them the highest military reputation. Their sleets covered the Ocean. Their dominions and settlements extended along the western and eastern sides of the vast African continent. From the Red Sea to China and Japan they were sole masters of the riches of the East; and in America, the sertile and extensive regions of Brazil compleated their Empire. It is not therefore to be wondered at, that the imagination of Camoens was warmed with the view of his Country's greatness, and that he talks of its power and grandeur in a strain, which must appear as mere hyperbole to those whose ideas of Portugal are drawn from its present diminished state. After the descat of Don Sebastian at Alcazar, which was the first step of the declension of the Portuguese grandeur, his uncle Cardinal Enricus ascended the throne; but he dying after a reign of two years, Philip II. of Spain made himfelf matter of the kingdom of Portugal, which remained under the Spanish yoke for about fixty years. During this period, the Dutch possessed themselves of the best Portuguese settlements in the East Indies, in Africa and America; and thus, a fudden evening interrupted the grandeur of the Portuguese: So just is the observation of Goldsmith,

That Trade's proud Empire hastes to swift decay,

As Ocean sweeps the labour'd mole away; While self-dependent power can time defy, As rocks resist the billows and the sky.

May the English East India Company, in the midst of their successes, remember the fate of their predecessors, and ever be guarded against that politic people, who, according to the principles on which they have always acted, would take the same advantages of the weakness of England, which heretosore they took of the distresses of Portugal!

h The Sun—Imitated perhaps from Rutilius, fpeaking of the Roman Empire, Volvitur ipje tibi, qui conspicit omnia, Phæbus, Atque tuis ortos in tua condit equos.

Thou blooming Scion of the noblest stem, Our nation's fafety, and our age's gem, O young Sebastian, hasten to the prime Of manly youth, to Fame's high temple climb: Yet now attentive hear the Muse's lav While thy green years to manhood fpeed away: The youthful terrors of thy brow fuspend, And, O propitious, to the fong attend, The numerous fong, by Patriot-passion fir'd, And by the glories of thy race inspir'd: To be the Herald of my Country's fame My first ambition and my dearest aim: Nor conquests fabulous, nor actions vain, The Muse's pastime, here adorn the strain: Orlando's fury, and Rugero's rage, And all the heroes of th' Aonian page, The dreams of Bards furpass'd the world shall view, And own their boldest fictions may be true; Surpass'd, and dimm'd by the superior blaze Of GAMA's mighty deeds, which here bright Truth difplays. Nor more let History boast her heroes old, Their glorious rivals here, dread Prince, behold: Here shine the valiant Nunio's deeds unfeign'd, Whose fingle arm the falling state sustain'd; or more probably from these lines of Buchanan, addressed to John III. king of Portugal, the grand sather of Sebastian.

Inque tuis Phæbus regnis oriensque caaensque Vix longum fesso conderet axe diem. Et quæcunque vago se circumvolvit Olympo Assulget ratibus slamna ministra tuis. Here fearless Egas' wars, and, Fuas, thine, To give full ardour to the fong combine; But ardour equal to your martial ire Demands the thundering founds of Homer's lyre. ' To match the Twelve fo long by Bards renown'd, Here brave Magrizo and his Peers are crown'd (A glorious Twelve.!) with deathless laurels, won In gallant arms before the English throne. Unmatch'd no more the Gallic Charles shall stand, Nor Cæsar's name the first of praise command: Of nobler acts the crown'd Alphonsos see, Thy valiant Sires, to whom the bended knee Of vanquish'd Afric bow'd. Nor less in same, He who confin'd the rage of civil flame, The godlike John, beneath whose awful fword Rebellion crouch'd, and trembling own'd him Lord. Those Heroes too, who thy bold flag unfurl'd, And fpread thy banners o'er the eastern world, Whose spears subdued the kingdoms of the morn, Their names, and glorious wars the fong adorn: The daring GAMA, whose unequal'd name Proud monarch shines o'er all of naval fame: Castro the bold, in arms a peerless knight, And stern Pacheco, dreadful in the fight:

the Episode of Magrizo and his eleven companions, see the fixth Lusiad.

To match the Twelve fo long by Bards renown'd—The Twelve Peers of France, often mentioned in the old Romances. For

The two Almeydas, names for ever dear, By Tago's nymphs embalm'd with many a tear; Ah, still their early fate the nymphs shall mourn, And bathe with many a tear their hapless urn: Nor shall the godlike Albuquerk restrain The Muse's fury; o'er the purpled plain The Muse shall lead him in his thundering car Amidst his glorious brothers of the war, Whose fame in arms resounds from sky to sky, And bids their deeds the power of death defy. And while, to thee, I tune the duteous lay, Assume, O potent King, thine Empire's sway; With thy brave host through Afric march along, And give new triumphs to immortal fong: On thee with earnest eyes the nations wait, And cold with dread the Moor expects his fate; The barbarous Mountaineer on Taurus' brows To thy expected yoke his shoulder bows; To thee, fair Thetis yields her blue domain, And binds her daughter with thy nuptial chain; And from the bowers of heaven thy Grandfires k fee Their various virtues bloom afresh in thee; One for the joyful days of Peace renown'd, And one with War's triumphant laurels crown'd:

^{*} Thy Grandfires - John III. King of Portugal, celebrated for a long and peaceful reign;

With joyful hands, to deck thy manly brow,
They twine the laurel and the olive-bough;
With joyful eyes a glorious throne they fee,
In Fame's eternal dome, referv'd ' for thee.
Yet while thy youthful hand delays to wield
The fcepter'd power, or thunder of the field,
Here view thine Argonauts, in feas unknown,
And all the terrors of the burning zone,
Till their proud standards, rear'd in other skies,
And all their conquests meet thy wondering " eyes.

Now far from land, o'er Neptune's dread abode
The Lusitanian sleet triumphant rode;
Onward they traced the wide and lonesome main,
Where changeful Proteus leads his scaly train;
The dancing vanes before the Zephyrs flow'd,
And their bold keels the tractless Ocean plow'd;
Unplow'd before, the green-ting'd billows rose,
And curl'd and whiten'd round the nodding prows.
When Jove, the God who with a thought controuls
The raging seas, and balances the poles, beautiful complaint of his blindness has been blamed for the same reason, as being no part of the subject of his Poem. The address of Camoens to Don Sebastian has not escaped the same censure; though in some measure undeservedly, as the Poet has had the art to interweave therein some part of the general argument of his poem.

From

¹ Anne novum tardís sidus te mensibus addas, Qua locus Erigonen inter chelasque sequentes Panditur: ipse tibi jam brachia contrahit ardens

Scorpius, et cali justa plus parte reliquit.
VIRG. G. I.

m Some Critics have condemned Virgil for stopping his narrative to introduce even a short observation of his own. Milton's

From heav'n beheld, and will'd, in fovereign state, To fix the eastern World's depending fate: Swift at his nod th' Olympian herald flies, And calls th' immortal fenate of the skies; Where, from the fovereign throne of earth and heaven, Th' immutable decrees of fate are given. Instant the Regents of the spheres of light, And those who rule the paler orbs of night, With those, the gods whose delegated sway The burning South and frozen North obey; And they whose empires see the day-star rise, And evening Phæbus leave the western skies, All instant pour'd along the milky road, Heaven's chrystal pavements glittering as they trode: And now, obedient to the dread command, Before their awful Lord in order stand.

Sublime and dreadful on his regal throne,
That glow'd with stars, and bright as lightning shone,
Th' immortal Sire, who darts the thunder, sate,
The crown and sceptre added solemn state;
The crown, of heaven's own pearls, whose ardent rays,
Flam'd round his brows, outshone the diamond's blaze:
His breath such gales of vital fragrance shed,
As might, with sudden life, inspire the dead:

Supreme Controul throned in his awful eyes

Appear'd, and mark'd the Monarch of the skies.

On seats that burn'd with pearl and ruddy gold,

The subject Gods their sovereign Lord enfold,

Each in his rank, when, with a voice that shook

The towers of heaven the world's dread Ruler spoke:

Immortal heirs of light, my purpose hear, My counsels ponder, and the Fates revere: Unless Oblivion o'er your minds has thrown Her dark blank shades, to you, ye Gods, are known The Fate's Decree, and ancient warlike Fame Of that bold race which boafts of Lusus' name; That bold advent'rous race the Fates declare, A potent empire in the East shall rear, Surpassing Babel's or the Persian fame, Proud Grecia's boaft, or Rome's illustrious name. Oft from those brilliant feats have you beheld The fons of Lusus on the dusty field, With few triumphant o'er the numerous Moors, Till from the beauteous lawns on Tagus' shores. They drove the cruel foe. And oft has heaven Before their troops the proud Castilians driven; While Victory her eagle-wings display'd Where'er their Warriors waved the shining blade.

Nor

Nor rests unknown how Lusus' heroes stood
When Rome's ambition dy'd the world with blood;
What glorious laurels Viriatus gain'd,
How oft his sword with Roman gore was stain'd;
And what fair palms their martial ardour crown'd,
When led to battle by the Chief renown'd,
Who feign'd a dæmon, in a deer conceal'd,
To him the counsels of the Gods reveal'd.

n This brave Lusitanian, who was first a shepherd and a famous hunter, and afterwards a captain of banditti, exasperated at the tyranny of the Romans, encouraged his countrymen to revolt and shake off the yoke. Being appointed General, he deseated Vetilius the Prætor, who commanded in Lusitania, or farther Spain. After this he deseated in three pitched battles, the Prætors C. Plautius Hypsæus, and Claudius Unimanus, though they led against him very numerous armies. For six years he continued victorious, putting the Romans to slight wherever he met them, and laying waste the countries of their allies. Having obtained such advantages over the Proconsul Servilianus, that the only choice which was lest to the Roman army was death or slavery; the brave Viriatus, instead of putting them all to the sword, as he could easily have done, sent a deputation to the General, offering to conclude a peace with him on this single condition, That he should continue Masser of the Country new in his power, and that the Romans should remain possessed the rest of Spain.

The Proconful, who expected nothing but death or stavery, thought these very favourable and moderate terms, and without hesitation concluded a peace, which was soon after ratisfied by the Roman senate and people. Viriatus, by this treaty, compleated the glorious design he had always in view, which was to erect a kingdom in the vast country he had conquered from the Republic. And had it not been for the treachery of the Romans, he would have become, as Florus calls him, the Romulus of Spain: He would have founded a monarchy capable of counterbalancing the power of Rome.

of counterbalancing the power of Rome.

The Senate, still desirous to revenge their late deseat, soon after this peace ordered Q. Servilius Cæpio to exasperate Viriatus, and force him by repeated affronts to commit the first acts of hostility. But this mean artistice did not succeed: Viriatus would not be provoked to a breach of the peace. On this the Conscript Fathers, to the eternal disgrace of their Republic, ordered Cæpio to delare war, and to proclaim Viriatus, who had given no provocation, an enemy to Rome. To this baseness Cæpio added still a greater; he corrupted the ambassadors which Viriatus had sent to negotiate with him, who, at the instigation of the Roman, treacherously murdered their Protector and General while he slept.----UNIV. HIST.

O Sertorius, who was invited by the Lufitanians to defend them against the Romans. He had a tame white Hind, which he had accustomed to follow him, and from which he pretended to receive the instructions of Diana. By this artifice he imposed upon the superstition of that people.

Vid. PLUT.

And now ambitious to extend their fway Beyond their conquests on the southmost bay Of Afric's fwarthy coast, on floating wood They brave the terrors of the dreary flood, Where only black-wing'd mists have hover'd o'er, Or driving clouds have fail'd the wave before; Beneath new skies they hold their dreadful way To reach the cradle of the new-born day: And Fate, whose mandates unrevok'd remain, Has will'd, that long shall Lusus' offspring reign The lords of that wide sea, whose waves behold The fun come forth enthroned in burning gold. But now the tedious length of winter past, Distress'd and weak, the heroes faint at last. What gulphs they dared, you faw, what storms they braved, Beneath what various heavens their banners waved! Now Mercy pleads, and foon the rifing land To their glad eyes shall o'er the waves expand; As welcome friends the natives shall receive, With bounty feast them, and with joy relieve. And when refreshment shall their strength renew, Thence shall they turn, and their bold rout pursue.

So fpoke high Jove: The Gods in filence heard, 'Then rifing each, by turns, his thoughts preferr'd:

But chief was Bacchus P of the adverse train; Fearful he was, nor fear'd his pride in vain, Should Lusus' race arrive on India's shore, His ancient honours would be named no more; No more in Nysa 9 should the natives tell What kings, what mighty hosts before him fell. The fertile vales beneath the rifing fun He view'd as his, by right of victory won, And deem'd that ever in immortal fong The Conqueror's title should to him belong. Yet Fate, he knew, had will'd, that loos'd from Spain Boldly advent'rous thro' the polar main, A warlike race should come, renown'd in arms, And shake the eastern world with war's alarms, Whose glorious conquests and eternal fame In black Oblivion's waves should whelm his name.

Urania-Venus', Queen of facred Love, Arose a pleader on the part of Jove;

P But chief was Bacchus.—The French Translator has the following note on this place: Le Camoens n'a pourtant sait en cela que suivre l'exemple de l'Ecriture, comme on le voit dans ces paroles du premiere chapitre de Job. Quidam autem die cum venissent, &cc. Un jour que les ensans du Seigneur s'etoient assemble devant son trone, Satan y vint aussi, &c.

^q No more in Nyfa.—An antient city in India facred to Bacchus.

¹ Urania-Venus.—An Italian poet has given the following description of the celestial Venus.

Questa è vaga di Dio Venere bella
Vicina al Sole, e sopra ogni altra estella
Questa è quella beata, a cui s'inchina,
A cui si volge desiando amore,
Chiamata cui aet Ciel rara e divina
Beltà che vien tra noi per nostro bonore,
Per sar le menti desiando al Cielo
Obliare l'altrui col proprio velo.
MARTEL.

Her eyes, well pleas'd, in Lusus' sons could trace A kindred likeness to the Roman race, For whom of old fuch kind regard she bore; The same their triumphs on Barbaria's shore, The same the ardour of their warlike flame, The manly music of their tongue the 'fame: Affection thus the lovely Goddess sway'd, Nor less what Fate's unblotted page display'd, Where'er this people should their empire raise, She knew her altars would unnumbered blaze, And barbarous nations at her holy shrine Be humaniz'd, and taught her lore divine. Her spreading honours thus the one inspired, And one the dread to lose his worship fired. Their struggling factions shook th' Olympian state With all the clamorous tempest of debate. Thus when the storm with sudden gust invades The antient forest's deep and lofty shades, The bursting whirlwinds tear their rapid course, The shatter'd oaks crash, and with echoes hoarse The mountains groan, while whirling on the blast The thickening leaves a gloomy darkness cast;

Com pouca corrupção eré que be Latina. Qualifications are never elegant in poetry. Fanshaw's translation, and the original, both prove this.

Which she thinks Latin with small dross among.

Such

See the note in the Second Book on the following paffage;—

As when in Ida's bower she stood of yore, &c.

The manly music of their tongue the same.

Camoens says,

E na lingoa, na qual quando imagina,

Such was the tumult in the blest abodes, When Mars, high towering o'er the rival Gods, Stept forth: stern sparkles from his eye balls glanc'd, And now, before the throne of Jove advanc'd, O'er his left shoulder his broad shield he throws, And lifts his helm above his dreadful brows: Bold and enrag'd he stands, and, frowning round, Strikes his tall spear-staff on the sounding ground; Heaven trembled, and the light turn'd pale *---Such dread His fierce demeanour o'er Olympus spread: When thus the Warrior,---O Eternal Sire, Thine is the sceptre, thine the thunder's fire, Supreme dominion thine; then, Father, hear, Shall that bold Race which once to thee was dear, Who now fulfilling thy decrees of old, Through these wild waves their fearless journey hold, Shall that bold Race no more thy care engage, But fink the victims of unhallowed rage! Did Bacchus yield to Reason's voice divine, Bacchus the cause of Lusus' sons would join, Lusus, the lov'd companion of his cares, His earthly toils, his dangers, and his wars: But Envy still a foe to worth will prove, . To worth though guarded by the arm of Jove.

the happiest manner of Camoens,
O ceo tremeo, e Apollo detorvado
Hum pauco a luz perdes, como infiado-and the light turn'd pale—The thought in the Original has something in it wildly great, though it is not expressed in

Then thou, dread Lord of Fate, unmov'd remain,.

Nor let weak change thine awful counsels stain,

For Lusus' Race thy promis'd favour shew:

Swift as the arrow from Apollo's bow

Let Maia's son explore the watery way,

Where spent with toil, with weary hopes, they stray;

And safe to harbour, through the deep untried,

Let him, impower'd, their wandering vessels guide;

There let them hear of India's wish'd-for shore,

And balmy rest their fainting strength restore.

He spoke: high Jove affenting bow'd the head, And floating clouds of nectar'd fragrance shed: Then lowly bending to th' Eternal Sire, Each in his duteous rank, the Gods retire.

Whilst thus in Heaven's bright palace Fate was weigh'd, Right onward still the brave Armada stray'd:
Right on they steer by Ethiopia's strand
And pastoral Madagascar's b verdant land.
Before the balmy gales of cheerful spring,
With heav'n their friend, they spread the canvas wing;
The sky cerulean, and the breathing air,
The lasting promise of a calm declare.

b And passoral Madagascar — Called by the ancient Geographers Menuthia, and Cerna Ethiopica; by the natives, the Island of the Moon; and by the Portuguese, the Isle of St. Laurence, on whose festival they discovered it.

Behind them now the Cape of Praso bends, Another Ocean to their view extends, Where black-topt islands, to their longing eyes, Lav'd by the gentle waves, in prospect rise. But GAMA, (captain of the vent'rous band, Of bold emprize, and born for high command, Whose martial fires, with prudence close allied, Ensured the smiles of fortune on his side) Bears off those shores which waste and wild appear'd, And eastward still for happier climates steer'd: When gathering round and blackening o'er the tide, A fleet of small canoes the Pilot spied; Hoisting their sails of palm-tree leaves, inwove With curious art, a swarming crowd they move: Long were their boats, and sharp to bound along Through the dash'd waters, broad their oars and strong: The bending rowers on their features bore The fwarthy marks of Phaeton's 'fall of yore:

The historical foundation of the fable of Phaeton is this. Phaeton was a young enterprifing Prince of Libya. Crossing the Mediterranean in quest of adventures he landed at Epirus, from whence he went to Italy to see his intimate friend Cygnus. Phaeton was skilled in astrology, from whence he arrogated to himself the title of the son of Apollo. One day in the heat of fummer as he was riding along the banks of the Po, his horses took fright at a clap of thunder, and plunged into the river, where together with their master they perished. Cygnus, who was a Poet, celebrated the death of his friend in verse, from whence the fable.

Vid. Plutar. in vit. Pyrr.

Lav'd by the gentle waves—The Origimal fays, the Sea shewed them new islands, which it encircled and laved. Thus rendered by Fanshaw, Neptune disclos'd new isles which he did play About, and with his billows dane't the bay.

of Phaeton's fall—
ferunt luctu Cycnum Phaetonis amati,
Populeas inter frondes umbramque sororum
Dum canit, & mæslum musa solatur amorem:
Canentem molli pluma duxisse senestam,
Linquentem terras, et sidera voce sequentem.
VIRG. EN.

When flaming lightnings fcorch'd the banks of Po, And nations blacken'd in the dread o'erthrow. Their garb, discover'd as approaching nigh, Was cotton strip'd with many a gaudy dye: 'Twas one whole piece beneath one arm confin'd, The rest hung loose and flutter'd on the wind; All, but one breast, above the loins was bare, And swelling turbans bound their jetty hair: Their arms were bearded darts and faulchions broad, And warlike music sounded as they row'd. With joy the failors faw the boats draw near, With joy beheld the human face appear: What nations these, their wondering thoughts explore, What rites they follow, and what God adore! And now with hands and kerchiefs wav'd in air The barb'rous race their friendly mind declare. Glad were the crew, and ween'd that happy day Should end their dangers and their toils repay. The lofty masts the nimble youths ascend, The ropes they haule, and o'er the yard-arms bend; And now their bowsprits pointing to the shore, A fafe moon'd bay, with flacken'd fails they bore: With cheerful shouts they furl the gather'd fail That less and less flaps quivering on the gale; The prows, their speed stopt, o'er the surges nod, The falling anchors dash the foaming flood;

When

When fudden as they stopt, the fwarthy race With fmiles of friendly welcome on each face, Alert and bounding, by the cordage climb: Illustrious GAMA, with an air sublime, Soften'd by mild humanity, receives, And to their chief the hand of friendship gives, Bids spread the board, and, instant as he faid,. Along the deck the festive board is spread: The sparkling wine in chrystal goblets glows, And round and round with cheerful welcome flows. While thus the Vine its sprightly glee inspires, From whence the fleet, the swarthy Chief enquires, What feas they past, what vantage would attain, And what the shore their purpose hop'd to gain? From farthest west, the Lusian race reply, To reach the golden eastern shores we try. Through that unbounded fea whose billows roll From the cold northern to the fouthern pole; And by the wide extent, the dreary vast Of Afric's bays, already have we past; And many a sky have seen, and many a shore, Where but sea-monsters cut the waves before. To spread the glories of our Monarch's reign, For India's shore we brave the trackless main, Our glorious toil, and at his nod would brave The difmal gulphs of Acheron's black wave.

And now, in turn, your race, your Country tell, If on your lips fair truth delights to dwell, To us, unconscious of the falsehood, shew What of these seas and India's site you know.

Rude are the natives here, the Moor reply'd, Dark are their minds, and brute-defire their guide: But we of alien blood, and strangers here, Not hold their customs nor their laws revere. From Abram's 'race our holy prophet forung, An Angel taught, and heaven inspir'd his tongue; His facred rites and mandates we obey, And distant Empires own his holy sway. From isle to isle our trading vessels roam, Mozambic's harbour our commodious home. If then your fails for India's shores expand, For fultry Ganges or Hydaspes' strand, Here shall you find a Pilot skill'd to guide Through all the dangers of the per'lous tide, Though wide spread shelves, and cruel rocks unseen, Lurk in the way, and whirlpools rage between. Accept, mean while, what fruits these islands hold, And to the Regent let your wish be told.

from Ishmael, the son of Abraham by Hagar.

From Abram's race our boly prophet

Then may your mates the needful stores provide, And all your various wants be here supplied.

So spake the Moor, and bearing smiles untrue And signs of friendship, with his bands withdrew. O'erpower'd with joy unhop'd the failors stood, To find such kindness on a shore so rude.

Now shooting o'er the flood his fervid blaze,
The red-brow'd Sun withdraws his beamy rays;
Safe in the bay the crew forget their cares,
And peaceful rest their wearied strength repairs.
Calm Twilight show his drowsy mantle spreads,
And shade on shade, the gloom still deepening sheds.
The Moon, full orb'd, forsakes her watery cave,
And lifts her lovely head above the wave.
The showy splendors of her modest ray
Stream o'er the glist'ning waves, and quivering play:
Around her, glittering on the heav'ns arch'd brow,
Unnumber'd stars, enclos'd in azure, glow,

f Calm Twilight now—Camoens, in this passage, has imitated Homer in the manner of Virgil: by diversifying the scene he has made the description his own. The passage alluded to is in the eighth Iliad:

Ως δ' ότ' is έξαιῷ ἄτςα φαιιτης άμφὶ σιλήτης Φαίνιτ' αςιπειπία, &c.

Thus elegantly translated by Pope:

As when the moon, refulgent lamp of night, O'er heaven's clear azure spreads her sacred light, When not a breath disturbs the deep screne, And not a cloud o'ereasts the solemn scene; Around her throne the volvid planets roll, And stars unnumber'd gild the glowing pole,. O'er the dark trees a yellower werdure shed, And tip with silver every mountain's head; Then shine the vales, the rocks in prospect rise, A shood of glory bursts from all the skies: The conscious sevains rejoicing in the sight, Eye the blue wault, and bless the useful light.

Thick as the dew-drops of the rofy dawn,
Or May-flowers crouding o'er the daify-lawn:
The canvas whitens in the filvery beam,
And with a paler red the pendants gleam:
The masts' tall shadows tremble o'er the deep;
The peaceful winds an holy silence keep;
The watchman's carol echo'd from the prows,
Alone, at times, awakes the still repose.

Aurora now, with dewy lustre bright, Appears, ascending on the rear of night. With gentle hand, as feeming oft to paufe, The purple curtains of the morn she draws; The fun comes forth, and foon the joyful crew, Each aiding each, their joyful tasks pursue. Wide o'er the decks the spreading fails they throw; From each tall mast the waving streamers flow; All feems a festive holiday on board To welcome to the fleet the island's Lord. With equal joy the Regent fails to meet, And brings fresh cates, his offerings, to the fleet: For of his kindred Race their line he deems. That savage Race who rush'd from Caspia's streams, And triumph'd o'er the East, and, Asia won, In proud Byzantium fixt their haughty throne.

Brave

Brave Vasco hails the chief with honest smiles, And gift for gift with liberal hand he piles. His gifts, the boast of Europe's arts disclose, And fparkling red the wine of Tagus flows. High on the shrouds the wondering failors hung, To note the Moorish garb, and barbarous tongue: Nor less the subtle Moor, with wonder fired, Their mien, their dress, and lordly ships admired: Much he enquires their King's, their Country's name, And, if from Turkey's fertile shores they came? What God they worshipp'd, what their facred lore, What arms they wielded, and what armour wore? To whom brave GAMA; Nor of Hagar's blood Am I, nor plow from Izmael's shores the flood; From Europe's strand I trace the foamy way, To find the regions of the infant day. The God we worship stretch'd yon heaven's high bow, And gave these swelling waves to roll below; The hemispheres of night and day he spread, He scoop'd each vale, and rear'd each mountain's head; His Word produc'd the nations of the earth, And gave the spirits of the sky their birth; On Earth, by him, his holy lore was given, On Earth he came to raise mankind to heaven. And now behold, what most your eyes desire, Our shining armour, and our arms of fire;

For who has once in friendly peace beheld, Will dread to meet them on the battle field.

Strait as he spoke the Magazines display'd Their glorious shew, where, tire on tire inlaid, Appear'd of glittering steel the carabines, There the plumed helms, and ponderous brigandines; O'er the broad bucklers sculptur'd orbs embost The crooked faulchions dreadful blades were crost: Here clasping greaves, and plated mail-quilts strong. The long-bows here, and rattling quivers hung, And like a grove the burnish'd spears were seen, With darts, and halberts double-edged between; Here dread grenadoes, and tremendous bombs, With deaths ten thousand lurking in their wombs, And far around of brown, and dusky red The pointed piles of iron balls were spread. The Bombadeers, now to the Regent's view The thundering mortars and the cannon drew; Yet at their Leader's nod, the sons of flame (For brave and generous ever are the fame)

explique en peu des mots la Religion que les Portugais suivent, l'usage des armes dont ils se servent dans la guerre, et le dessein qui les amene.

This omission affords us one of the numberless instances of the unpoetical taste of the French Paraphrist.

Withheld

E Strait as he spoke—The description of the armoury, and the account which Vasco de Gama gives of his religion, consists, in the Original, of thirty-two lines, which M. Castera has reduced into the following sentence: Leur Governeur fait differentes questions au Capitaine, qui pour le satisfaire lui Withheld their hands, nor gave the feeds of fire To rouse the thunders of the dreadful tire. For Gama's soul disdain'd the pride of shew Which acts the lion o'er the trembling roe.

His joy and wonder oft the Moor exprest,
But rankling hate lay brooding in his breast;
With smiles obedient to his will's controul,
He veils the purpose of his treacherous soul:
For Pilots, conscious of the Indian strand
Brave Vasco sues, and bids the Moor command
What bounteous gifts shall recompence their toils;
The Moor prevents him with assenting smiles,
Resolved that deeds of death, not words of air,
Shall first the hatred of his soul declare;
Such sudden rage his rankling mind posses,
When GAMA's lips Messiah's name confest,
Oh depth of heaven's dread will, that rancorous hate

When Gama's lips Messiah's name consess.

This, and of consequence, the reason of the Moor's hate, is entirely omitted by Castera. The original is, the Moor conceived hatred, "knowing they were fol-"lowers of the truth which the Son of David taught." Thus rendered by Fanshaw, Knowing they follow that unerring light, The Son of David holds out in his Book. By this Solomon must be understood, not the Messiah, as meant by Camoens. Zacocia, (governor of Mozambic) made no doubt but our people were of fome Mohammedan country.—The mutual exchange of good offices between our people and these islanders promised a long continuance of friendship, but it proved otherwise. No fooner did Zacocia understand they were Christians, than all his kindness was turned into the most bitter hatred; he began to meditate their ruin, and sought by every means to destroy the sect.—Oforio, Bp. of Sylves, Hist. of the Portug. Discov.

E 2

Now smiling round on all the wondering crew The Moor attended by his bands withdrew; His nimble barges soon approach'd the land, And shouts of joy received him on the strand.

From heaven's high dome the Vintage-God beheld;

(Whom haine long months his father's thigh conceal'd)

Well-pleased he mark'd the Moor's determined hate

And thus his mind revolved in self-debate:

Has heaven, indeed, such glorious lot ordain'd!

By Lusus' race such conquests to be gain'd

O'er warlike nations, and on India's shore,

Where I unrival'd, claim'd the palm before!

I sprung from Jove! and shall these wandering sew,

What Ammon's son unconquer'd left, subdue!

Ammon's brave son who led the God of war

His slave auxiliar at his thundering car!

Must these possess what Jove to him deny'd,

Possess what never sooth'd the Roman pride!

Must these the Victor's lordly slag display

With hateful blaze beneath the rising day, infancy in a cave of mount Meros, which in Greek fignifies a thigh. Hence the fable.

h Whom nine long months his father's thigh conceal'd.---According to the Arabians, Bacchus was nourished during his

My name dishonour'd, and my victories stain'd, O'erturn'd my altars, and my shrines profaned!
No---be it mine to fan the Regent's hate;
Occasion seized commands the action's fate.
'Tis mine---this captain now my dread no more,
Shall never shake his spear on India's shore.

So spake the Power, and with the lightning's flight
For Afric darted thro' the fields of light.

His form divine he cloath'd in human shape,
And rush'd impetuous o'er the rocky cape:
In the dark semblance of a Moor he came
For art and old experience known to fame:
Him all his peers with humble deference heard
And all Mozambic and its prince rever'd:
The Prince in haste he sought, and thus exprest
His guileful hate in friendly counsel drest:

And to the Regent of this isle alone

Are these Adventurers and their fraud unknown?

Has Fame conceal'd their rapine from his ear?

Nor brought the groans of plunder'd nations here?

i His form divine he cloath'd in human shape.

Alecto torvam faciem et furialia membra

Exuit: in vultus sese transformat aniles,

Et frontem obsecunm rugis arat.

VIR. En. 7.

Yet still their hands the peaceful olive bore Whene'er they anchor'd on a foreign shore: But nor their feeming, nor their oaths I trust, For Afric knows them bloody and unjust. The nations fink beneath their lawless force, And fire and blood have mark'd their deadly courfe. We too, unless kind heaven and Thou prevent, Must fall the victims of their dire intent, And, gasping in the pangs of death, behold Our wives led captive, and our daughters fold. By stealth they come, ere morrow dawn, to bring The healthful beverage from the living spring: Arm'd with his troop the Captain will appear; For conscious fraud is ever prone to fear. To meet them there felect a trufty band, And in close ambush take thy filent stand, There wait, and sudden on the heedless foe Rush, and destroy them ere they dread the blow. Or fay should some escape the secret snare Saved by their fate, their valour, or their care, Yet their dread fall shall celebrate our isle, If fate confent, and thou approve the guile. Give then a Pilot to their wandering fleet, Bold in his art, and tutor'd in deceit; Whose hand adventurous shall their helms misguide, To hostile shores, or whelm them in the tide.

So spoke the God, in semblance of a sage Renown'd for counsel and the craft of age. The Moor with transport glowing in his face Approved, and caught him in a kind embrace; And instant at the word his bands prepare Their bearded darts and implements of war, That Lusus' fons, might purple with their gore, The chrystal fountain which they fought on shore: And still regardful of his dire intent, A skilful pilot to the bay he sent; Of honest mien, yet practised in deceit, Who far at distance on the beach should wait, And to the 'scaped, if some should 'scape the snare Should offer friendship and the pilot's care, But when at fea, on rocks should dash their pride, And whelm their lofty vanes beneath the tide.

Apollo now had left his watery bed,
And o'er the mountains of Arabia fpread
His rays that glow'd with gold; when GAMA rose,
And from his bands a trusty squadron chose:
Three speedy barges brought their casks to fill
From gurgling sountain, or the chrystal rill:
Full-arm'd they came, for brave defence prepared,
For martial care is ever on the guard:

And fecret warnings ever are imprest

On wisdom such as waked in GAMA's breast.

And now, as fwiftly springing o'er the tide Advanced the boats, a troop of Moors they fpy'd; O'er the pale fands the fable warriors crowd, And tofs their threatening darts, and shout aloud. Yet feeming artless, though they dared the fight, Their eager hope they placed in artful flight, To lead brave GAMA where unfeen by day In dark-brow'd shades their filent ambush lay. With fcornful gestures o'er the beach they stride, And push their level'd spears with barbarous pride, Then fix the arrow to the bended bow, And strike their founding shields, and dare the foe. With generous rage the Lusian Race beheld, And each brave breast with indignation swell'd, To view fuch foes like fnarling dogs display Their threatening tusks, and brave the fanguine fray: Together with a bound they fpring to land, Unknown whose step first trode the hostile strand.

Thus k, when to gain his beauteous Charmer's smile, The youthful Lover dares the bloody toil, ercise in Spain, where it is usual to see young Gentlemen of the best families entering the lists to sight with a Bull, adorned with ribbons, and armed with a javelin or k Thus when to gain his beauteous Charmer's smile,

The youthful Lower dares the bloody toil.

This similie is taken from a favourite ex-

Before the nodding Bull's stern front he stands, He leaps, he wheels, he shouts, and waves his hands: The lordly brute disdains the stripling's rage, His nostrils smoke, and, eager to engage, His horned brows he levels with the ground, And shuts his flaming eyes, and wheeling round With dreadful bellowing rushes on the foe, And lays the boaftful gaudy champion low. Thus to the fight the fons of Lufus fprung, Nor flow to fall their ample vengeance hung: With fudden roar the carabines refound, And bursting echoes from the hills rebound; The lead flies hissing through the trembling air, And death's fell dæmons through the flashes glare. Where, up the land, a grove of palms enclose, And cast their shadows where the fountain flows, The lurking ambush from their treacherous stand Beheld the combat burning on the strand: They see the flash with sudden lightnings flare, And the blue smoke slow rolling on the air: They fee their warriors drop, and, starting, hear The lingering thunders bursting on their ear.

kind of cutlas, which the Spaniards call Machete. Though Camoens in this description of it has given the victory to the Bull, it very seldom so happens, the young Caballeros being very expert at this valorous exercife, and ambitious to display their dexterity, which is a sure recommendation to the favour and good opinion of the Ladies.

Amazed, appall'd, the treacherous ambush fled, And raged ', and curst their birth, and quaked with dread. The bands that vaunting shew'd their threaten'd might, With flaughter gored, precipitate in flight; Yet oft, though trembling, on the foe they turn Their eyes that red with lust of vengeance burn: Aghast with fear and stern with desperate rage The flying war with dreadful howls they wage, Flints m, clods, and javelins hurling as they fly, As rage and wild despair their hands supply: And foon difperst, their bands attempt no more To guard the fountain or defend the shore: O'er the wide lawns no more their troops appear: Nor fleeps the vengeance of the Victor here; To teach the nations what tremendous fate From his right arm on perjur'd vows should wait, He feized the time to awe the eastern world, And on the breach of faith his thunders hurl'd. From his black ships the fudden lightnings blaze, And o'er old Ocean flash their dreadful rays:

Jamque faces et saxa volant, suror arma ministrat. Virg. En. I. The Spanish Commentator on this Place relates a very extraordinary instance of the suror arma ministrans. A Portuguese Soldier at the siege of Diu in the Indies being surrounded by the enemy, and having no ball to charge his musket, pulled out one of his teeth, and with it supplied the place of a bullet.

Flints, clods, and jayelins hurling as they fly,
As rage, &c.

White clouds on clouds inroll'd the smoke ascends,
The bursting tumult heaven's wide concave rends:
The bays and caverns of the winding shore
Repeat the cannon's and the mortar's roar:
The bombs, far-slaming, his along the sky,
And whirring through the air the bullets sly;
The wounded air with hollow deafen'd sound,
Groans to the direful strife, and trembles round.

Now from the Moorish town the sheets of fire. Wide blaze succeeding blaze, to heaven aspire. Black rife the clouds of smoke, and by the gales Borne down, in streams hang hovering o'er the vales; And flowly floating round the mountain's head Their pitchy mantle o'er the landscape spread. Unnumber'd fea-fowl rifing from the shore, Beat round in whirls at every cannon's roar: Where o'er the smoke the masts' tall heads appear, Hovering they scream, then dart with sudden fear, On trembling wings far round and round they fly, And fill with difmal clang their native sky. Thus fled in rout confus'd the treacherous Moors From field to field, then, hastning to the shores, Some trust in boats their wealth and lives to fave, And wild with dread they plunge into the wave:

F 2

Some

Some spread their arms to swim, and some beneath
The whelming billows, struggling, pant for breath,
Then whirl'd aloft their nostrils spout the brine;
While showering still from many a carabine
The leaden hail their sails and vessels tore,
Till struggling hard they reach'd the neighb'ring shore:
Due vengeance thus their persidy repay'd,
And GAMA's terrors to the East display'd.

Imbrown'd with dust a beaten pathway shews
Where 'midst unbrageous palms the fountain flows;
From thence at will they bear the liquid health;
And now sole masters of the island's wealth,
With costly spoils and eastern robes adorn'd,
The joyful victors to the fleet return'd.

With hell's keen fires still for revenge athirst,
The Regent burns, and weens, by fraud accurst,
To strike a surer, yet a secret blow,
And in one general death to whelm the foe.
The promised Pilot to the sleet he sends
And deep repentance for his crime pretends.
Sincere the Herald seems, and while he speaks,
The winning tears steal down his hoary cheeks.
Brave Gama, touch'd with generous woe, believes,
And from his hand the Pilot's hand receives:

A dreadful

A dreadful gift! instructed to decoy, In gulphs to whelm them, or on rocks destroy.

The valiant Chief, impatient of delay, For India now refumes the watery way; Bids weigh the anchor and unfurl the fail, Spread full the canvas to the rifing gale; He spoke; and proudly o'er the foaming tide, Borne on the wind, the full-wing'd vessels ride; While as they rode before the bounding prows The lovely forms of sea-born nymphs arose. The while brave Vasco's unfufpecting mind Yet fear'd not ought the crafty Moor defign'd: Much of the coast he asks, and much demands Of Afric's shores and India's spicy lands. The crafty Moor by vengeful Bacchus taught Employ'd on deadly guile his baneful thought; In his dark mind he plann'd, on GAMA's head Full to revenge Mozambic and the dead. Yet all the Chief demanded he reveal'd, Nor ought of truth, that truth he knew, conceal'd: For thus he ween'd to gain his eafy faith, And gain'd, betray to flavery or to death. And now fecurely trufting to destroy, As erst false Sinon snared the sons of Troy,

Behold,

Behold, disclosing from the sky, he cries, Far to the north, you cloud-like isle arise: From ancient times the natives of the shore The blood-stain'd Image on the Cross adore. Swift at the word, the joyful GAMA cry'd, For that fair island turn the helm aside, O bring my veffels where the Christians dwell, And thy glad lips my gratitude shall tell: With fullen joy the treacherous Moor comply'd, And for that island turn'd the helm aside. For well Quiloa's fwarthy race he knew, Their laws and faith to Hagar's offspring true; Their strength in war, through all the nations round, Above Mozambic and her powers renown'd; He knew what hate the Christian name they bore, And hoped that hate on Vasco's bands to pour.

Right to the land the faithless Pilot steers,
Right to the land the glad Armada bears;
But heavenly Love's fair Queen, whose watchful care
Had ever been their guide, beheld the snare.

fpoke the Arabic language, GAMA was obliged to employ them both as Pilots and Interpreters. The circumstance now mentioned by Camoens is an historical fact. The Moorish Pilot, says De Barros, intended to conduct the Portuguese into Quiloa, telling them that place was inhabited by Christians, but a sudden storm arising, drove the sleet from that shore, where death

[&]quot; But beavenly Love's fair Queen—When Gama arrived in the East, the Moors were the only people who engrossed the trade of those parts. Jealous of such formidable rivals as the Portuguese, they employed every artifice to accomplish the destruction of Gama's sleet, for they foresaw the confequences of his return to Portugal. As the Moors were acquainted with these seasons

A fudden storm she rais'd: Loud howl'd the blast, The yard-arms rattled, and each groaning mast Bended beneath the weight. Deep funk the prows, And creaking ropes the creaking ropes oppose; In vain the Pilot would the speed restrain, The Captain shouts, the Sailors toil in vain; Assope and gliding on the leeward side The bounding vessels cut the roaring tide: Soon far they past; and now the slacken'd sail Trembles and bellies to the gentle gale: Now many a league before the tempest tost The treacherous Pilot sees his purpose crost: Yet vengeful still, and still intent on guile, Behold, he cries, you dim emerging isle: There live the votaries of Messiah's lore In faithful peace and friendship with the Moor. Yet all was false, for there Messiah's name, Reviled and scorn'd, was only known by fame. The groveling natives there, a brutal herd, The fenfual lore of Hagar's fon preferr'd.

or flavery would have been the certain fate of Gama and his companions. The villany of the Pilot was afterwards discovered. As Gama was endeavouring to enter the port of Mombaze his ship struck on a fand bank, and finding their purpose of bringing him into the harbour defeated, two of the Moorish Pilots leaped into the sea and swam ashore. Alarmed at this tacit acknowledgement of guilt, Gama ordered two other Moorish Pilots who remained on board to be examined by whipping, who, after some time, made a full confession of their intended villany. This discovery greatly encouraged GAMA and his men, who now interpreted the sudden storm which had driven them from Quiloa as a miraculous interposition of the Divine Providence in their favour.

With joy brave GAMA hears the artful tale, Bears to the harbour, and bids furl the fail. Yet watchful still fair Love's celestial Queen Prevents the danger with an hand unseen; Nor past the bar his ventrous vessels guides, And safe at anchor in the road he rides.

Between the isle and Ethiopia's land
A narrow current laves each adverse strand;
Close by the margin where the green tide slows,
Full to the bay a lordly city rose;
With fervid blaze the glowing Evening pours
Its purple splendors o'er the losty towers;
The losty towers with milder lustre gleam,
And gently tremble in the glassy stream.
Here reign'd an hoary King of ancient same;
Mombaze the town, and fertile island's name.

As when the Pilgrim, who with weary pace
Through lonely wastes untrod by human race,
For many a day disconsolate has stray'd,
The turf his bed, the wild-wood boughs his shade,
O'erjoy'd beholds the cheerful seats of men
In grateful prospect rising on his ken:
So Gama joy'd, who many a dreary day
Had trac'd the vast, the lonesome watery way,

Had

艺!

Had feen new stars, unkown to Europe, rise,
And brav'd the horrors of the polar skies:
So joy'd his bounding heart, when proudly rear'd,
The splendid City o'er the wave appear'd,
Where heaven's own lore, he trusted, was obey'd,
And Holy Faith her facred rites display'd.
And now swift crowding through the horned bay
The Moorish barges wing'd their foamy way,
To Gama's sleet with friendly smiles they bore
The choicest products of their cultured shore.
But there fell rancour veil'd its serpent-head,
Though sestive roses o'er the gifts were spread.
For Bacchus veil'd, in human shape, was here,
And pour'd his counsel in the Sovereign's ear.

O piteous lot of Man's uncertain state!

What woes on life's unhappy journey wait!

When joyful hope would grasp its fond desire,

The long-sought transports in the grasp expire.

By sea what treacherous calms, what rushing storms,

And death attendant in a thousand forms!

By land what strife, what plots of secret guile,

How many a wound from many a treacherous smile!

O where shall Man escape his numerous soes,

And rest his weary head in safe repose!

END OF THE FIRST BOOK.

and making the state of the sta

L U S I A D.

BOOK II.

Behind the western hills now died away,
And night, ascending from the dim-brow'd east,
The twilight gloom with deeper shades increast;
When Gama heard the creaking of the oar,
And markt the white waves lengthening from the shore;
In many a skiff the eager natives came,
Their semblance friendship, but deceit their aim.
And now by Gama's anchor'd ships they ride,
And, Hail illustrious chief, their leader cried,
Your same already these our regions own,
How your bold prows from worlds to us unknown

G 2

Have

Have braved the horrors of the fouthern main, Where storms and darkness hold their endless reign, Whose whelmy waves our westward prows have barr'd From oldest times, and ne'er before were dared By boldest Leader: Earnest to behold The wondrous hero of a toil fo bold, To you the Sovereign of these islands sends The holy vows of peace, and hails you friends. If friendship you accept, whate'er kind heaven In various bounty to these shores has given, Whate'er your wants, your wants shall here supply, And fafe in port your gallant fleet shall lie; Safe from the dangers of the faithless tide, And fudden bursting storms, by you untry'd; Yours every bounty of the fertile shore, 'Till balmy rest your wearied crew restore. Or if your toils and ardent hopes demand The various treasures of the Indian strand, The fragrant cinnamon, the glowing clove, And all the riches of the spicy grove; Or drugs of power the fever's rage to bound, Or give foft langour to the fmarting wound; Or if the fplendor of the diamond's rays, The fapphire's azure, or the ruby's blaze, Invite your fails to fearch the Eastern world, Here may these sails in happy hour be furl'd:

For here the splendid treasures of the mine,
And richest offspring of the field combine.
To give each boon that human want requires,
And every gem that lofty pride desires;
Then here, a potent King your generous friend,
Here let your per'lous toils and wandering searches * end.

He faid: brave GAMA smiles with heart sincere;
And prays the herald to the king to bear
The thanks of grateful joy: but now, he cries,
The black'ning evening veils the coast and skies,
And through these rocks unknown forbids to steer;
Yet when the streaks of milky dawn appear Edging the eastern wave with silver hore
My ready prows shall gladly point to shore;
Assured of friendship, and a kind retreat,
Assured and proffer'd by a King so great.
Yet mindful still of what his hopes had cheer'd,
That here his nation's holy shrines were rear'd, et aquis dulcibus. Utitur præterea mira cælitemperie. Homines vivunt admodum laute, et domos more nostro ædisicant...-Misit rex nuncios, qui Gamam nomine illius salutarent. . . . Aiunt deinde regionem illam esse opulentissimam, earumque rerum omnium plenissimam, quarum gratia multi in Indiam navigabant. Regem aded esse in illos voluntate propensum ut nihil esset tam dissicile, quod non se eorum gratia facturum polliceretur." Osorius Silvensis Episc. de Rebus Emman. Regis Lusit. gestis.

² After Gama had been driven from Quiloa by a sudden storm, the assurances of the Mozambic pilot that the city was chiesly inhabited by Christians, strongly inclined him to enter the harbour of Mombaze; "Nec ullum locum (says Osorius) magis opportunum curandis atque resciendis ægrotis posse reperiri. Jam eo tempore bona pars eorum, qui cum Gama conscenderant, variis morbis consumpta sucrat, et qui evaserant, erant gravi invaletudine debilitati. Tellus abundat fructibus et oleribus, et frugibus, et pecorum et armentorum gregibus,

He asks, if certain as the Pilot told,
Messiah's lore had flourished there of old,
And flourished still? The Herald mark'd with joy
The pious wish, and watchful to decoy,
Messiah here, he cries, has altars more
Than all the various shrines of other lore.
O'erjoyed brave Vasco heard the pleasing tale,
Yet fear'd that fraud its viper-sting might veil
Beneath the glitter of a shew so fair,
He half believes the tale, and arms against the snare.

Whose headlong rage had urg'd the guilty hand:
Stern Justice for their crimes had ask'd their blood,
And pale in chains condemn'd to death they stood;
But sav'd by GAMA from the shameful death,
The bread of peace had seal'd their plighted faith,

b Erant enim in ea classe decem homines capite damnati, quibus suerat ea lege vita concessa, ut quibuscunque in locis a Gama relicti suissent, regiones lustrarent, hominumque mores et instituta cognescerent. Osor.

During the reign of Emmanuel, and his predecessor John II. sew criminals were executed in Portugal. These great and political princes employed the lives which were forfeited to the public in the most dangerous undertakings of public utility. In their foreign expeditions the condemned criminals were sent upon the most hazardous emergencies. If death was their fate, it was the punishment they had merited: if successful in what was requited, their crimes were expiated; and often, as in the voyage of GAMA, they rendered their country the greatest atonement for their guilt which men in their circumstances could possibly make. Where the subject thus obtrudes the occasion, a short digression, it is hoped, will be pardoned. While every feeling breast must be pleased with the wisdom and humanity of the Portuguese monarchs, indignation and regret must rise on the view of the present state of the penal laws of England. What multitudes every year, in the prime of their life, end their days by the hand of the exceutioner! That the Legislature might devise means to make the greatest part of these lives useful to society is a fact, which surely cannot be disputed; though perhaps the remedy of an evil so shocking to humanity may be at some distance.

The desolate coast, when ordered, to explore, And dare each danger of the hostile shore: From this bold band he chose the subtlest two, The port, the city, and its strength to view, To mark if fraud its fecret head betrayed, Or if the rites of heaven were there displayed. With costly gifts, as of their truth secure, The pledge that GAMA deem'd their faith was pure. These two his Heralds to the King he sends: The faithless Moors depart as smiling friends. Now thro' the wave they cut their foamy way, Their chearful fongs refounding through the bay: And now on shore the wondering natives greet, And fondly hail the strangers from the fleet. The prince their gifts with friendly vows receives, And joyful welcome to the Lusians gives; Where'er they pass, the joyful tumult bends, And through the town the glad applause attends. But he whose cheeks with youth immortal shone, The God whose wondrous birth two mothers own, Whose rage had still the wandering fleet annoyed, Now in the town his guileful rage employed. A Christian priest he seem'd; a sumptuous shrine He rear'd, and tended with the rites divine:

In these lines, the best of all Fanshaw, the happy repetition " so chaste, so white," is a beauty which, though not contained in the original, the present translator was unwilling to lose.

On it, the pisture of that shape he plac't. In which the Holy Spirit did alight, The pisture of the Dove, so white, so chaste, On the blest Virgin's head, so chaste, so white.

4.8

O'er the fair altar waved the cross on high, Upheld by angels leaning from the fky; Descending o'er the Virgin's facred head So white, fo pure, the Holy Spirit spread The dove-like pictured wings, fo pure, fo white; And, hovering o'er the chosen twelve, alight The tongues of hallowed fire. Amazed, opprest, With facred awe their troubled looks confest The inspiring Godhead, and the prophet's glow, Which gave each language from their lips to flow. Where thus the guileful Power his magic wrought DE GAMA's heralds by the guides are brought: On bended knees low to the earth they fall, And to the Lord of heaven in transport call. While the feign'd Priest awakes the censer's fire, And clouds of incense round the shrine aspire. With chearful welcome here, carefs'd, they stay Till bright Aurora, messenger of day, Walk'd forth; and now the fun's resplendent rays, Yet half emerging o'er the waters, blaze, When to the fleet the Moorish oars again Dash the curl'd waves, and wast the guileful train: The lofty decks they mount. With joy elate, Their friendly welcome at the palace-gate,

4 See the Preface.

The King's fincerity, the people's care,
And treasures of the coast the spies declare:
Nor past untold what most their joys inspired,
What most to hear the valiant chief desired,
That their glad eyes had seen the rites divine,
Their dountry's worship, and the sacred shrine.
The pleasing tale the joyful GAMA hears;
Dark fraud no more his generous bosom fears:
As friends sincere, himself sincere, he gives
The hand of welcome, and the Moors receives.
And now, as conscious of the destin'd prey,
The faithless race, with smiles and gestures gay,
Their skiffs forsaking, GAMA's ships ascend,
And deep to strike the treacherous blow attend.

d When Gama lay at anchor among the islands of St. George, near to Mozambic, "there came three Ethiopians on board, (says Faria y Sousa) who, seeing St. Gabriel painted on the poop, sell on their knees in token of their Christianity, which had been preached to them in the primitive times, though now corrupted." Barros, e. 4. and Castaneda, l. i. c. 9. report, that the Portuguese found two or three Abyssinian Christians in the city of Mombaze, who had an oratory in their house. The following short account of the Christians of the East may perhaps be acceptable. In the south parts of Malabar, about 200000 of the inhabitants professed Christianity before the arrival of the Portuguese. They called themselves the Christians of Saint Thomas, by which apostle their ancestors had been converted. For 1300 years they had been under the Patriarch of Babylon, who appointed their Meterane or archbishop.

Dr. Geddes, in his History of the Church of Malabar, relates, that Francisco Roz, a jesuit missionary, complained to Menezes, the Portuguese archbishop of Goa, that when he shewed these people an image of our Lady, they cried out. "Away with that filthines, we are Christians, and do not adore idols or pagods."

Dom. Frey Aleixo de Menezes, archbishop of Goa, did "endeavour to thrust upon the church of Malabar the whole mass of popery, which they were before unacquainted with." To this purpose he had engaged all the neighbouring princes to assist him, "and had secured the major part of the priests present, in all one hundred and fifty three, whereof two-thirds were ordained by himfelf, and made them abjure their old religion, and subscribe the creed of pope Pius IV." Millar's History of the Propag. of Christianity.

On shore the truthless monarch arms his bands, And for the fleet's approach impatient stands: That foon as anchor'd in the port they rode Brave Gama's decks might reek with Lusian blood: Thus weening to revenge Mozambic's fate, And give full furfeit to the Moorish hate; And now their bowsprits bending to the bay The joyful crew the ponderous anchors weigh, Their shouts the while resounding. To the gale With eager hands they spread the fore-mast sail. But Love's fair Queen the secret fraud beheld: Swift as an arrow o'er the battle-field. From heaven she darted to the watery plain, And call'd the fea-born nymphs, a lovely train, From Nereus sprung; the ready nymphs obey, Proud of her kindred birth, and own her fway.

ranslator has the following note on this place, "Cet endroit est l'un de ceux qui montrent combien l'Auteur est habile dans la mythologie, et en même tems combien de penétration son allégorie demande. Il y a bien peu de gens, qui en lisant ici, &c.—This is one of the places which discover our Author's intimate acquaintance with Mythology, and at the same time how much attention his allegory requires. Many readers, on sinding that the protectres of the Lusians sprung from the sea, would be apt to exclaim, Behold, the birth of the terrestrial Venus! How can a nativity so infamous be ascribed to the celestial Venus, who represents Religion? I answer, that Camoens had not his eye on those fables, which derive the birth of Venus from the which stowed from the dishonest wound of. Saturn; he carries his views higher; his-Venus is from a fable more noble. Nigidius relates, that two fishes one day conveyed an egg to the sea shore: This egg was hatched by two pigeons whiter than snow, and gave birth to the Assyrian Venus, which, in the Pagan theology, is the same with the celestial: She instructed mankind in Religion, gave them the lessons of virtue and the laws of equity. Jupiter, in reward of her labours, promised to grant her whatever she defired. She prayed him to give immortativy to the two sishes, who had been instrumental in her birth, and the sishes were accordingly placed in the Zodiac.

This sable agrees persectly with Religion, as I could clearly shew; but I think it more proper to leave to the ingenious reader the pleasure of tracing the allegory." Thus the

She tells what ruin threats her fav'rite race;
Unwonted ardour glows on every face;
With keen rapidity they bound away,
Dash'd by their silver limbs, the billows grey
Foam round: Fair Doto, sir'd with rage divine,
Darts through the wave, and onward o'er the brine
The 'lovely Nyse and Nerine spring
With all the vehemence and speed of wing.
The curving billows to their breasts divide
And give a yielding passage through the tide.

rgrave Castera.—Besides the above, Mythology gives two other accounts of the origin of the sign Pisces. When Venus and Cupid-sled from the rage of Typhon, they were saved by two sisses, who carried them over the river Euphrates. The sisses, in return, were placed in the Zodiac. Another sable says, that that favour was obtained by Neptune for the two Dolphins, who sirst brought him his beloved Amphitrite. This variety in the Pagan Mythology is, at least, a proof that the allegory or a Poet ought not, witnout full examination, to be condemned on the appearance of inconsistency.

Doto, Nyse, and Nerine—Cloto, or Clotho, as Castera observes, has by some error crept into almost all the Portuguese editions of the Lusiad. Clotho was one of the Fates, and neither Hesiod, Homer, nor Virgil have given such a name to any of the Nercides; but in the ninth Eneid Doto is mentioned,

Agnique jubebo

Aquoris esse Deas, qualis Nereia Doto

Et Galatea secat spumantem pestore pontum.

The Nereides, in the Lustad, says Castera, are the virtues divine and human. In the stirst book they accompany the Portuguese

The lovely forms of sea-born nymphs arose.

" And without doubt, fays he, this allegory, in a lively manner, represents the condi-tion of mankind. The virtues languish in repose; adversities animate and awake them. The fleet failing before a favourable wind is followed by the Neseides, but the Nereides are scattered about in the sea. When danger becomes imminent, Venus, or Religion, assembles them to its safety." Whatever the reader may think of the intention of Camoens, there is undoubtedly a prettiness in this explication. The following part is indeed highly pedantic. "Doto, continues Castera, is derived from the verb Διδωμι, I give. According to this etymology Doto is Charity. Nyse is Hope, and Nerine Faith. For the name Nyle comes from Niw, I froim. For the action of Hope agrees with that of swimming, and is the symbol of it. Nerine is a term composed of might, an old word, which fignifies the waters of the Sea, and of fin, a file; as if one should say, the file of the sea-waters, a mysterious expression, applicable to Faith, which is the file of our foul, and which is rendered perfect by the water of baptism." Our French Translator wisely adds, that perhaps some persons may despise this etymology, but that for his part, he is unwilling to reject it, as it tends to unravel the allegory of his author. With furious speed the Goddess rush'd before, Her beauteous form a joyful Triton bore, Whose eager face with glowing rapture fired, Betray'd the pride which fuch a task inspired. And now arriv'd, where to the whistling wind The warlike Navy's bending masts reclin'd, As through the billows rush'd the speedy prows, The nymphs dividing, each her station chose. Against the Leader's prow, her lovely breast With more than mortal force the Goddess prest; The ship recoiling trembles on the tide, The nymphs in help pour round on every fide, From the dread bar the threaten'd keels to fave; The ship bounds up, half lifted from the wave, And trembling, hovers o'er the watry grave. As when alarm'd, to fave the hoarded grain, The care-earn'd store for Winter's dreary reign, So toil, fo tug, fo pant, the labouring Emmet train. So toil'd the Nymphs, and strain'd their panting force To turn 5 the Navy from its fatal course: Back, back the ship recedes; in vain the crew With shouts on shouts their various toils renew; In vain each nerve, each nautic art they strain, And the rough wind distends the sail in vain:

Esmitated from Virgil.

Cymothoë simul, et Triton adnixus acuto
Detrudunt naves scopulo.

VIRG. En. I.

Enraged,

Enraged, the Sailors see their labours crost; From fide to fide the reeling helm is tost; High on the poop the skilful master stands; Sudden he shrieks aloud, and spreads his hands. A lurking rock its dreadful rifts betrays, And right before the prow its ridge displays; Loud shrieks of horror from the yard-arms rife, And a dire general yell invades the skies. The Moors start, fear-struck, at the horrid found, As if the rage of combat roar'd around. Pale are their lips, each look in wild amaze The horror of detected guilt betrays. Pierc'd by the glance of GAMA's awful eyes The conscious Pilot quits the helm and flies, From the high deck he plunges in the brine; His mates their fafety to the waves confign; Dash'd by their plunging falls on every side Foams and boils up around the rolling tide. Thus b the hoarse tenants of the sylvan lake, A Lycian race of old, to flight betake, standards. A detachment of these going to drink at a lake in Lycia, a croud of peafants endeavoured to prevent them. An encounter ensued; the peasants sled to the lake for shelter, and were these slain. Some months afterwards their companions came in search of their corpses, and sinding an unusual quantity of frogs, imagined, according to the superstition of their age, that the souls of their friends appeared to them under that metamorphosis.

Is it allowable in Epic Poetry to introduce h Latona, fays the fable, flying from the ferpent Python, and faint with thirst, came to a pond, where some Lycian peasants were cutting the bulrushes. In revenge of the infults which they offered her in preventing her to drink, she changed them into frogs. This fable, says Castera, like almost all the rest, is drawn from history. Philocorus, as cited by Boccace, relates, that the Rhodians thaving declared war against the Lycians, were assisted by some troops from Delos, who carried the image of Latona on their

At every found they dread Latona's hate,
And doubled vengeance of their former fate;
All fudden plunging leave the margin green,
And but their heads above the pool are feen.
So plung'd the Moors, when, horrid to behold!
From the bar'd rock's dread jaws the billows roll'd,
Opening in inftant fate the fleet to whelm.
When ready Vasco caught the ftaggering helm:
Swift as his lofty voice refounds aloud
The ponderous anchors dash the whitening flood,
And round his vessel, nodding o'er the tide,
His other ships, bound by their anchors, ride.
And now revolving in his piereing thought
These various scenes with hidden import fraught;

a comparison taken from a low image? This is a question which has exercised the abilities of Critics and Translators, till criticism has degenerated into trisling, and learning into pedantry. To some it may perhaps appear needless to vindicate Camoens, in a point wherein he is supported by the authority of Homer and Virgil. Yet as many readers are infected with the sang froid of a Bossu or a Perrault, an observation in defence of our Poet cannot be thought impertinent. If we examine the finest essuine poetical feeling has often dictated those similies which are drawn from familiar and low objects. The Sacred Writers, and the greatest Poets of every nation, have used them. We may therefore conclude, that the criticism which condemns them is a refinement not founded on Nature. But, allowing them admissible, it must be observed, that to render them pleasing requires a peculiar happiness and delicacy of management. When the Poet attains this indispensible point, he gives a striking proof of his elegance, and of his mastership in his art. That the similies of the Emmets and of the Frogs in Camoens are happily expressed and applied, is indisputable. In that of the Frogs there is a peculiar propriety, both in the comparison itself, and in the allusion to the fable; as it was the intent of the Poet to represent not only the slight, but the baseness of the Moors. The similie he seems to have copied from Dante, Inf.

Come le rane innanzi a la nemica Bifcia per l'acqua si dileguan' tutte Fin che a la terra ciascuna s'abbica. And Cant. 22.

E come a l'orlo de l'acqua d'un fosso Stan' li ranocchi pur col muso suori Si' che celano i piedi, e l'altro grosso.

The boaftful Pilot's felf-accusing flight, The former treason of the Moorish spight: How to the fatal rock the furious wind. The rushing current, and their art combin'd: Yet though the groaning blast the canvas swell'd, Some wondrous cause, unknown, their speed witheld: Amaz'd, with hands high rais'd, and sparkling eyes, A miracle! the raptur'd GAMA cries, A miracle! O hail, thou facred fign, Thou pledge illustrious of the Care Divine. Ah! fraudful Malice! how shall Wisdom's care Escape the poison of thy gilded snare! The front of honesty, the saintly shew, The smile of friendship, and the holy vow; All, all conjoin'd our easy faith to gain, To whelm us, shipwreck'd, in the ruthless main;

Oforius gives the following account of this adventure. Talking of the two Exiles, whom Gama had fent on shore; Rex latae et hilari fronte exules accepit, imperavitque domesticis suis, ut illis urbis situm et pulchritudinem demonstrarent. Ubi vero reversi sunt. Rex multa aromatum genera, quæ ex India deportari solent, illis estentat, et quantulum visum est donat, ut Gamæ monstrare possent, et admonere, quanto esse utilius apud Regem amicum rem gerere, quàm vitam tam periculose navigationi committere. Cum his mandatis redeunt exules in classem, Gama miriscè lætatus est, et postridie anchoras tolli jubet, et naves prope urbem constitui. Cùm verò illius navis æstus incitati vi celerius, quam commodum esset, inveheretur, timens ille nè in vadum incidezet, vela contrahere et anchoras demittere consestim jussit. . . . Quo sacto Mozambiquenfes gubernatores metu repentino perculfi, se præcipites in mare dejiciunt, et ad lintres quassam, quæ non procul aberat, nando confugiunt. At Gama magnis vocibus ad eos, qui in lintribus erant, inclamavit, ut sibi suos gubernatores redderent:

at illi clamores illius aspernati, gubernatores in terram exposuerunt. Hic Gama cum et conjectura, et aliquo etiam Arabis gubernatoris indicio, et multis præterea signis, perspexisset è quanto periculo suisset auxilio divino liberatus, manus in cœlum suffululit. Barros and Castaneda, in relating this part of the voyage of Gama, say, that the seet, just as they were entering the port of Mombassa were driven back, as it were,
by an invisible hand. By a subsequent note it will appear, that the safety of the Armada depended upon this circumstance.

But where our prudence no deceit could fpy,
There, heavenly Guardian, there thy watchful eye
Beheld our danger: still, O still prevent,
Where human foresight fails, the dire intent,
The lurking treason of the smiling foe;
And let our toils, our days of lengthning woe,
Our weary wanderings end. If still for thee,
To spread thy rites, our toils and vows agree,
On India's strand thy facred shrines to rear,
Oh, let some friendly land of rest appear:
If for thine honour we these toils have dar'd,
These toils let India's long-sought shore reward.

So spoke the Chief: the pious accents move
The gentle bosom of Celestial Love:
The beauteous Queen to heaven now darts away;
In vain the weeping nymphs implore her stay:
Behind her now, the morning star she leaves,
And the 's sixth heaven her lovely form receives.
Her radiant eyes such living splendors cast,
The sparkling stars were brighten'd as she past;
The frozen pole with sudden streamlets slow'd,
And as the burning zone with fervor glow'd.

k As the planet of Jupiter is in the fixth heaven, the Author has with propriety there placed the throne of that God. C.

And now confest before the throne of Jove,
In all her charms appears the queen of Love:
Flush'd by the ardour of her rapid slight
Through sields of æther and the realms of light,
Bright as the blushes of the roseate morn,
New blooming tints her glowing cheeks adorn;
And all that pride of beauteous grace she wore,
As ' when in Ida's bower she stood of yore,
When every charm and every hope of joy
Enraptured and allured the Trojan boy.
Ah! " had that hunter, whose unhappy fate
The human visage lost by Dian's hate, récrier que cet endroit-ci ne convient nullement à la Venus celeste.—I am aware of the objection, that this passage is by no means applicable to the celestial Venus. I answer once for all, that the names and adventures of the Pagan Divinities are so blended and uncertain in Mythology, that a Poet is at great liberty to adapt them to his allegory as he pleases. Even the fables, which, to those who penetrate no deeper than the Rhind, may appear as prosane, even these contain historical, physical, and moral truths, which fully atone for the seeming licenciousness of the letter. I could prove this in many instances, but let the present suffice. Paris, son of Priam, king of Troy, spent his first years as a shepherd in the country. At this time Juno, Minerva, and Venus disputed for the apple of gold, which was destined to be given to the most beautiful goddess. They consented that Paris should be their judge. His equity claimed this honour. He saw them all naked. Juno promised him riches, Minerva the sciences, but he decided in favour of Venus, who promised him the possession of the most beauful woman. What a ray of light is contained in this philosophical sable! Paris represents a studious man, who, in the silence of solitude, seeks the supreme good. Juno is the emblem of riches and dignities, Minerva, that of the sciences purely human, Venus is that of Religion, which contains the sciences both human and divine; the charming semale, which she promises to the Trojan shepherd, is that Divine Wisdom which gives tranquillity of heart. A Judge so philosophical as Paris would not hesitate a moment to whom to give the apple of gold. Thus Castera. The above may likewise serve as a comment on the passage in the first book. See pag. 16, l. 5.

book. See pag. 16, l. 5.

""The allegory of Camoens is here obvious. If Acteon, and the flaves of their violent paffions could discover the beauties of true religion, they would be assonished and reclaimed; according to the expression of Seneca, "Si virtus cerni postet oculis corporeis, omnes ad amorem suum pelli-ceret." Castera.

Had he beheld this fairer goddess move Not hounds had flain him, but the fires of love. Adown her neck, more white than virgin snow, Of foftest hue the golden tresses flow; Her heaving breasts of purer, softer white, Than fnow hills gliftening in the moon's pale light, Except where covered by the fash, were bare, And " Love, unseen, smil'd soft, and panted there: Nor less the zone the god's fond zeal employs, The zone awakes the flames of fecret joys. As ivy tendrils round her limbs divine Their fpreading arms the young defires entwine; Below her waist, and quivering on the gale, Of thinnest texture, flows the silken veil:

n " That is Divine Love, which always accompanies Religion. Behold how our Author infinuates the excellence of his moral!" Caftera.

As the French Translator has acknowledged, there is no doubt but several Readers will be apt to decry this allegorical interpre-tation of the machinery of Camoens. In-deed there is nothing more eafy for a fancy-ful genius, than to discover a system of allegory in the simplest narrative. The reign of Henry VIII. is as susceptible of it as any fable in the heathen Mythology. Nay, perhaps, more so. Under the names of Henry, More, Wolsey, Cromwell, Pole, Cranmer, &c. all the war of the passions, with their different catastrophes, might be delineated. But though it may be easy to find a metaphorical meaning, which was never intended by the Author, in what manner the Poets of the two last centuries adopted the use of allegory, is the question at present to be considered. Though it may be difficult to determine how far, yet one may venture to affirm, that Homer and Virgil sometimes allegorised. The poets, however, who wrote on the revival of letters, have left us in no doubt; we have their own authority for it, that their machinery is allegorical. Not only the Pagan Deities, but the more modern adventures of enchantment were used by them to delineate the affections; and the trials and rewards of the virtues and vices. Tasso published a treatise to prove that his Gierusalemme Liberata is no other than the Christian spiritual warfare. And Camoens, as observed in the presace, has twice asserted, that his machinery is allegorical. The Poet's affertion, and the taste of the age in which he wrote, sufficiently vindicate the Endeavour to unravel and explain the allegory of the Lufiad.

(Ah! where the lucid curtain dimly shows, With doubled fires the roving fancy glows!) The hand of modesty the foldings threw, Nor all conceal'd, nor all was given to view; Yet her deep grief her lovely face betrays, Though on her cheek the foft fmile faultering plays. All heaven was mov'd---as when fome damfel coy, Hurt by the rudeness of the amorous boy, Offended chides and fmiles; with angry mien Thus mixt with fmiles, advanc'd the plaintive queen; And othus: O Thunderer! O potent Sire! Shall I in vain thy kind regard require! Alas! and cherish still the fond deceit, That yet on me thy kindest smiles await. Ah heaven! and must that valour which I love Awake the vengeance and the rage of Jove! Yet mov'd with pity for my fav'rite race I speak, though frowning on thine awful face, I mark the tenor of the dread decree, That to thy wrath configns my fons and me. Yes! let stern Bacchus bless thy partial care, His be the triumph, and be mine despair. The bold advent'rous fons of Tajo's clime I loved---alas! that love is now their crime:

the first Eneid, and do great honour to the Classical taste of the Portuguese Poet.

[•] The following speech of Venus and the reply of Jupiter, are a fine imitation from

O happy they, and prosp'rous gales their fate, Had I purfued them with relentless hate! Yes! let my woeful fighs in vain implore, Yes! let them perish on some barb'rous shore, For I have loved them---Here, the fwelling figh And pearly tear-drop rushing in her eye, As morning dew hangs trembling on the rose, Though fond to speak, her further speech oppose---Her lips, then moving, as the paufe of woe Were now to give the voice of grief to flow; When kindled by those charms, whose woes might move, And melt the prowling Tyger's rage to love, The thundering God her weeping forrows ey'd, And sudden threw his awful state aside: With p that mild look which stills the driving storm, When black roll'd clouds the face of heaven deform; With that mild visage and benignant mien Which to the sky restores the blue serene, Her fnowy neck and glowing cheek he prest, And wip'd her tears, and clasp'd her to his breast; Yet she, still fighing, dropt the trickling tear, As the chid nursling, mov'd with pride and fear,

P.Imitated from VIRG. En I.

Olli subridens hominum sator atque Deorum, Vultu, quo cælum tempestatesque serenat, Oscula libavit natæ.—— Still fighs and moans, though fondled and careft; Till thus great Jove the Fates' decrees confest: O thou, my daughter, still belov'd as fair, Vain are thy fears, thy heroes claim my care: No power of gods could e'er my heart incline, Like one fond fmile, one powerful tear of thine. Wide o'er the eastern shores shalt thou behold Thy flags far streaming, and thy thunders roll'd; Where nobler triumphs shall thy nation crown, Than those of Roman or of Greek renown.

If by mine aid the fapient Greek could brave Th' Ogycian seas, nor 9 fink a deathless slave; If through th' Illyrian shelves Antenor bore, Till safe he landed on Timavus' shore; If, by his fate, the pious Trojan led, Safe through Charibdis' barking whirlpools sped: Shall thy bold Heroes, by my care disclaim'd, Be left to perish, who, to worlds unnam'd By vaunting Rome, pursue their dauntless way? No---foon shalt thou with ravish'd eyes survey, From stream to stream their lofty cities spread, And their proud turrets rear the warlike head:

q i. e. The flave of Calypso, who offered Ulysses immortality on condition he would live with her ⁻⁻ Sub antro Scyllam, et cærnleis chuibus refonantia faxa. VIRG. En. III.

The stern-brow'd Turk shall bend the suppliant knee, And Indian Monarchs, now fecure and free, Beneath thy potent Monarch's yoke shall bend, And thy just Laws, wide o'er the East, extend. Thy Chief, who now in Error's circling maze, For India's shore through shelves and tempests strays; Thy chief shalt thou behold, with lordly pride, O'er Neptune's trembling realm triumphant ride. O wondrous fate! when not a breathing 'gale Shall curl the billows, or diftend the fail, The waves shall boil and tremble, aw'd with dread, And own the terror o'er their empire spread. That barb'rous coast, with various streams supplied, Which, to his wants, the fountain's gifts deny'd; That coast shalt thou behold his Port supply, Where oft thy weary fleets in rest shall lie. Each shore which weav'd for him the snares of death, To him these shores shall pledge their offerr'd faith; To him their haughty Lords shall lowly bend, And yield him tribute for the name of friend.

The failors were terrified, and in the utmost consusion, thinking themselves lost. When Gama, perceiving it to be the effect of an earthquake, with his wonted heroism and prudence, exclaimed, "Of auhat are you afraid? Do you not see how the Ocean trembles under its Sovereigns!" Barros, L. 9. C. 1. and Faria, C. 9. who says, that such as lay sick of severs were cured by the fright.

^a After the Portuguese had made great conquests in India, Gama had the honour to be appointed Viceroy. In 1524, when failing thither to take possession of his government, his sleet was so becalmed on the coast Cambaya, that the ships stood motionless on the water, when in an instant, without the least change of the weather, the waves were shaken with a violent agitation, like trembling. The ships were tossed about,

The Red-sea wave shall darken in the shade
Of thy broad sails in frequent pomp display'd;
Thine eyes shall see the golden Ormuz' shore,
Twice thine, twice conquered, while the furious Moor,
Amazed, shall view his arrows backward 'driven,
Showered on his legions by the hand of heaven.
Though twice assailed by many a vengeful band,
Unconquered still shall Dio's ramparts stand,
Such prowess there shall raise the Lusian name
That Mars shall tremble for his blighted same;
There shall the Moors blaspheming sink in death,
And curse their prophet with their parting breath.

Where Goa's warlike ramparts frown on high,
Pleas'd shalt thou see thy Lusian banners sly;
The Pagan tribes in chains shall crowd her gate,
While she sublime shall tower in royal state,
The fatal scourge, the dread of all who dare
Against thy sons to plan the future war.
Though sew thy troops who Conanour sustain,
The foe, though numerous, shall assault in vain.
Great Calicut, for potent hosts renown'd,
By Lisbon's sons assail'd shall strew the ground:

wind the arrows of the latter were driver back upon themselves, whereby many o their troops were wounded.

t Both Barros and Castaneda relate this fact. Albuquerk, during the war of Ormuz, having given battle to the Persians and Moors, by the violence of a sudden

By Cochin's walls, against whole troops of foes, Shall one brave Lusian his proud breast oppose: Ne'er did the lyre refound a hero's name More brave, more worthy of immortal fame. When 'blackening broad and far o'er Actium's tide Augustus' fleets the flave of love defy'd, When that fallen Hero to the combat led The bravest troops in Bactrian Scythia bred, With Asian legions, and, his shameful bane, The Egyptian Queen attendant in the train; Though Mars raged high, and all his fury pour'd, Till with the storm the boiling surges roar'd, Yet shall thine eyes more dreadful scenes behold, On burning furges burning furges roll'd, The sheets of fire far billowing o'er the brine, While I my thunder to thy fons refign. Thus many a fea shall blaze, and many a shore Refound the horror of the combat's roar, While thy bold prows triumphant ride along By trembling China to the isles unfung

Hinc ope barbarica variifque Antonius armis
Vistor, ab Auroræ populis & litore rubro
Ægyptum, viresque Orientis, & ultima secum
Bastra vebit: sequiturque nefas! Ægyptia conjux.
Unà omnes ruere, ac totum spumare redustis
Convulsum remis rostrisque tridentibus æquor.

 By ancient bard, by ancient chief unknown, Till Ocean's utmost shore thy bondage own.

Thus from the Ganges to the Gadian strand,
From the most northern wave to southmost land;
That land which first, the Lusian shame and "pride,
The brave neglected Magalhaens descryed,
From all that Vast, though crown'd with heroes old,
Who with the gods were demi-gods enroll'd:
From all that Vast no equal heroes shine
To match in arms, O lovely daughter, thine.

So spake the awful Ruler of the skies,
And Maia's son swift at his mandate slies:
His charge, from treason and Mombassa's king
The weary fleet to friendly port to bring,
And while in sleep the brave DE GAMA lay,
To warn, and fair the shore of rest display.
Fleet through the yielding air Cyllenius glides,
As to the light, the nimble air divides.
The mystic helmet on his head he wore,
And in his right the fatal rod he * bore;

The Lusian shame and pride.---Magalhaens, a most celebrated navigator. Neglected by Emmanuel king of Portugal, he offered his service to the king of Spain, under whom he made most important discoveries round the Straits, which bear his name, and in the back parts of South America; acquirements, which at this day are of the utmost value to the Spanish Empire. Of this hero see further, X. Lusiad, in the notes.

w Tum virgam capit: hac animas ille evocat Orco

Pall entes, alias sub trissia Tartara mittit,
Dat somnos adimitque, & lumina morte resignat.

VIRG. ÆN. IV.

That

That rod, of power to wake the filent dead,
Or o'er the lids of care foft flumbers shed.
And now, attended by the herald Fame,
To fair Melinda's gate conceal'd he came;
And soon loud Rumour ecchoed through the town,
How from the western world, from waves unknown,
A noble band had reach'd the Æthiop shore,
Through seas and dangers never dared before:
The godlike dread attempt their wonder fires,
Their generous wonder fond regard inspires,
And all the city glows their aid to give,
To view the heroes, and their wants relieve.

'Twas now the folemn hour when midnight reigns, And dimly twinkling o'er the ethereal plains
The starry host, by gloomy silence led,
O'er earth and sea a glimmering paleness shed;
When to the fleet, which hemm'd with dangers lay,
The silver-wing'd Cyllenius darts away.
Each care was now in soft oblivion steep'd,
The Watch alone accustom'd vigils kept;
E'en Gama, wearied by the day's alarms,
Forgets his cares, reclined in slumber's arms.
Searce had he closed his careful eyes in rest,
When Maia's son in vision stood confest:
And sly, he cried, O Lusitanian, sly;
Here guile and treason every nerve apply:

An impious king for thee the toil prepares, An impious people weave a thousand snares: Oh fly these shores, unfurl the gather'd fail, Lo, heaven, thy guide, commands the rifing gale. Hark, loud it rustles, see, the gentle tide Invites thy prows; the winds thy lingering chide. Here fuch dire welcome is for thee prepared As * Diomed's unhappy strangers shared; His hapless guests at filent midnight bled, On their torn limbs his fnorting courfers fed. Oh fly, or here with strangers' blood imbrew'd Busiris' altars thou shalt find renew'd: Amidst his slaughter'd guests his altars stood Obscene with gore, and bark'd with human blood: Then thou, beloved of heaven, my counsel hear; Right by the coast thine onward journey steer, Till where the fun of noon no shade begets, But day with night in equal tenor fets. A Sovereign there, of generous faith unstain'd, With ancient bounty, and with joy unfeign'd Your glad arrival on his shore shall greet, And soothe with every care your weary fleet.

Quis—illaudati nescit Busiridis aras? Vinc. Geon. iii. Hercules vanquished both these tyrants, and put them to the same punishments which their cruelty had inslicted on others. Isocrates composed an oration in honour of Busiris; a masterly example of Attic raillery and satire. To this Castera wisely appeals, to prove the truth of the history of that tyrant.

^x Diomede, a tyrant of Thrace, who fed his horfes with human flesh; a thing, says the grave Castera, presque increyable, almost incredible. Busiris, was a king of Egypt, who facrificed strangers.

And when again for India's golden strand
Before the prosperous gale your fails expand,
A skilful Pilot oft in danger try'd,
Of heart sincere, shall prove your faithful guide.

Thus Hermes spoke, and as his flight he takes. Melting in ambient air, DE GAMA wakes. Chill'd with amaze he stood, when through the night With fudden ray appear'd the bursting light; The winds loud whizzing through the cordage figh'd, Spread, spread the fail, the raptured VASCO cried; Aloft, aloft, this, this the gale of heaven, By heaven our guide, th' auspicious sign is given; Mine eyes beheld the messenger divine, O fly, he cried, and gave the favouring fign, Here treason lurks. Swift as the Captain spake The mariners fpring bounding to the deck, And now with shouts far-ecchoing o'er the sea, Proud of their strength the ponderous anchors weigh. When heaven again its guardian care display'd; Above the wave rose many a Moorish head, Conceal'd by night they gently fwam along, And with their weapons fawed the cables strong,

Y Having mentioned the escape of the Moorish pilots, Osorius proceeds: Rex deinde homines magno cum silentio scaphis & lintribus submittebat, qui securibus anchoralia nocte præciderent. Quod niss suif-fet à nostris singulari Gamæ industria vigilatum, et insidiis scelerati illius regis occursum, nostri in summum vitæ discrimen incidissent. That by the fwelling currents whirl'd and tost, The navy's wrecks might strew the rocky coast. But now discover'd, every nerve they ply, And dive, and swift as frighten'd vermin fly.

Now through the filver waves that curling rose,
And gently murmur'd round the sloping prows,
The gallant fleet before the steady wind
Sweeps on, and leaves long foamy tracts behind;
While as they sail the joyful crew relate
Their wondrous safety from impending fate;
And every bosom feels how sweet the joy
When dangers past the grateful tongue employ.

The fun had now his annual journey run,
And blazing forth another course begun,
When smoothly gliding o'er the hoary tide
Two sloops afar the watchful master spied;
Their Moorish make the seaman's art display'd;
Here Gama weens to force the Pilot's aid:
One, base with fear, to certain shipwreck slew;
The keel dash'd on the shore, escap'd the crew.
The other bravely trusts the generous soe,
And yields, ere Slaughter struck the listed blow,
Ere Vulcan's thunders bellowed. Yet again
The Captain's prudence and his wish were vain;

No lip to tell where rolls the Indian tide;
The voyage calm, or perilous, or afar,
Beneath what heaven, or which the guiding star:
Yet this they told, that by the neighbouring bay
A potent monarch reign'd, whose pious sway
For truth and noblest bounty far renown'd,
Still with the Stranger's grateful praise was crown'd.
O'erjoyed brave GAMA heard the tale, which seal'd
The sacred truth that Maia's son reveal'd;
And bids the Pilot, warn'd by heaven his guide,
For fair Melinda turn the helm aside.

'Twas now the jovial feason, when the morn
From Taurus flames, when Amalthea's horn
O'er hill and dale the rose-crown'd Flora pours,
And scatters corn and wine, and fruits and flowers.
Right to the port their course the fleet pursued,
And the glad dawn that sacred day renewed,
When with the spoils of vanquish'd death adorn'd
To heaven the Victor of the tomb return'd.
And soon Melinda's shore the failors spy;
From every mast the purple streamers sly;
Rich-sigured tap'stry now supplies the fail,
The gold and scarlet tremble in the gale;
The standard broad its brilliant hues bewrays,
And floating on the wind wide-billowing plays;

Shrill

Shrill through the air the quivering trumpet founds, And the rough drum the roufing march rebounds. As thus regardful of the facred day The festive navy cut the watery way, Melinda's fons the shore in thousands crowd, And offering joyful welcome shout aloud: And truth the voice inspired. Unawed by fear, With warlike pomp adorn'd, himself fincere, Into the port the generous GAMA rides; His stately vessels range their pitchy sides Around their chief; the bowsprits nod the head, And the barb'd anchors gripe the harbour's bed. Strait to the king, as friends to generous friends, A captive Moor the valiant GAMA sends. The Lufian fame the king already knew, What gulphs unknown the fleet had labour'd through, What shelves, what tempests dared: His liberal mind Exults the Captain's manly trust to find; With that ennobling worth, whose fond employ Befriends the brave, the Monarch owns his joy, Entreats the Leader and his weary band To taste the dews of sweet repose on land, And all the riches of his cultured fields Obedient to the nod of GAMA yields. His care meanwhile their prefent want attends, And various fowl, and various fruits he fends;

The oxen low, the fleecy lambkins bleat, And rural founds are ecchoed through the fleet. His gifts with joy the valiant Chief receives, And gifts in turn, confirming friendship, gives. Here the proud scarlet darts its ardent rays, And there the purple and the orange blaze; O'er these profuse the branching coral spread, The 2 coral wondrous in its watery bed; Soft there it creeps, in curving branches thrown, In air it hardens to a precious stone. With these an Herald, on whose melting tongue The 'copious rhet'ric of Arabia hung, He fends, his wants and purpose to reveal, And holy vows of lasting peace to seal. The Monarch fits amidst his splendid bands, Before the regal throne the Herald stands, And thus, as eloquence his lips inspired, O King, he cries, for facred truth admired, Ordain'd by heaven to bend the stubborn knees Of haughtiest nations to thy just decrees; Fear'd as thou art, yet fent by heaven to prove That Empire's strength results from Public love:

> Vimen erat dum stagna subit, processerat undis Gemma suit. Sie et coralium, quo primum contigit auras, Tempore durescit, mollis suit berba sub undis.

CLAUD.

There were on board Gama's fleet several persons skilled in the Oriental languages.

Osor.

To

To thee, O King, for friendly aid we come;
Nor lawless Robbers o'er the seas we roam:
No lust of gold could e'er our breasts instame
To scatter fire and slaughter where we came;
Nor sword, nor spear our harmless hands employ
To seize the careless, or the weak destroy.
At our most potent Monarch's dread command
We spread the sail from lordly Europe's strand;
Through seas unknown, through gulphs untry'd before,
We force our journey to the Indian shore.

Alas, what rancour fires the human breast!

By what stern tribes are Afric's shores possest!

How many a wile they try'd, how many a snare!

Not wisdom sav'd us, 'twas the heaven's own care:

Not harbours only, e'en the barren sands

A place of rest deny'd our weary bands:

From us, alas, what harm could prudence fear!

From us so few, their numerous friends so near!

While thus from shore to cruel shore long driven,

To thee conducted by a guide from heaven,

We come, O Monarch, of thy truth assured,

Of hospitable rites by heaven secured;

Such a rites as old Alcinous' palace graced,

When lorn Ulysses sat his savour'd guest.

² See the Eighth Odyssey, &c.

Nor deem, O King, that cold suspicion taints
Our valiant Leader, or his wish prevents;
Great is our Monarch, and his dread command
To our brave Captain interdicts the land
Till Indian earth he tread: What nobler cause
Than loyal faith can wake thy fond applause,
O thou, who knowst the ever-pressing weight
Of kingly office, and the cares of state!
And hear, ye conscious heavens, if Gama's heart
Forget thy kindness, or from truth depart,
The sacred light shall perish from the Sun,
And Rivers to the sea shall cease to run.

b Castera's note on this place is so characteristical of a Frenchman, that the Reader will perhaps be pleased to see it transcribed. In his text he says, "Toi qui occupes si dignement le rang supreme—Le Poste dit, says he, in the note, Tens de Rey o officio, soi qui fais le metier de Rei—The Poet says, thou who holdest the business of a king. I confess, he adds, I found a strong inclination to translate this sentence literally. I sind much nobleness in it. However, I submitted to the opinion of some friends, who were afraid that the ears of Frenchmen would be shocked at the word business applied to a King. It is true, nevertheless, that Royalty is a business. Philip II. of Spain was convinced of it, as we may discern from one of his letters. Hallo, says he, me muy embaraçado, &c. I am so entangled and incumbered with the multiplicity of business, that I bave not a moment to myself: In truth, we kings hold a laborious office: (or trade) t'ere is little reason to envy us." May the politeness of England never be disgusted with the word businessi applied to a king!

"The propriety and artfulness of Homer's

The propriety and artfulness of Homer's fpeeches have been often and justly admired. Camoens is peculiarly happy in the same department of the Epopea. The speech of Gama's herald to the King of Melinda is a striking instance of it. The compliments with which it begins have a direct tendency to the favours afterward to be asked. The assurances of the innocence, the purpose of the Voyagers, and the greatness of their king, are happily touched. The exclamation on the barbarous treatment they had experienced, "Not wifdom faved us, but heaven's own care," are masterly infinuations. Their barbarous treatment is again repeated in a manner to move compassion: Alas! what could they fear, &c. is reasoning joined with the pathos. That they were conducted to the King of Melinda by heaven, and were by heaven affured of his truth, is a most delicate compliment, and in the true spirit of the Epic Poem. The allusion to Alcinous is well timed. The apology for Guma's refusal to come on shore, is exceeding artful. It conveys a proof of the greatness of the Portuguese Sovereign, and affords a compliment to Loyalty, which could not fail to be acceptable to a Monarch. In short, the whole of the speech supplicates warmly, but at the same time in the most manly manner; and the adjuration concludes it with all the appearance of warmth and fincerity. Eustathius would have written a whole chapter on fuch a speech in the Iliad or Odyssey.

He spoke; a murmur of applause succeeds, And each with wonder own'd the val'rous deeds Of that bold race, whose flowing vanes had wav'd Beneath fo many a fky, fo many an Ocean brav'd. Nor less the King their loyal faith reveres, And Lisbon's Lord in awful state appears, Whose least command on farthest shores obey'd, His fovereign grandeur to the world difplay'd. Elate with joy, uprofe the royal Moor, And fmiling thus, - O welcome to my shore! If yet in you the fear of treason dwell, Far from your thoughts th' ungenerous fear expel: Still with the brave, the brave will honour find, And equal ardour will their friendship bind. But those who spurn'd you, men alone in shew, Rude as the bestial herd, no worth they know; Such dwell not here: and fince your laws require Obedience strict, I yield my fond desire. Though much I wish'd your Chief to grace my board, Fair be his duty to his fovereign Lord: Yet when the morn walks forth with dewy feet My barge shall waft me to the warlike fleet; There shall my longing eyes the heroes view, And holy vows the mutual peace renew. What from the bluftering winds and lengthening tide Your ships have suffer'd, shall be here supply'd.

Arms and provisions I myself will send, And, great of skill, a Pilot shall attend.

So spoke the King: and now, with purpled ray, Beneath the shining wave the god of day Retiring, left the evening shades to spread; And to the fleet the joyful herald sped: To find fuch friends each breast with rapture glows, The feast is kindled, and the goblet flows; The trembling Comet's imitated rays Bound to the skies, and trail a sparkling blaze: The vaulting bombs awake their sleeping fire, And like the Cyclops' bolts, to heaven aspire: The Bombadeers their roaring engines ply, And earth and ocean thunder to the fky. The trump and fyfe's shrill clarion far around. The glorious music of the fight resound; Nor less the joy Melinda's fons display, The fulphur bursts in many an ardent ray, And to the heaven ascends in whizzing gyres, And Ocean flames with artificial fires. In festive war the sea and land engage, And echoing shouts confess the joyful rage. So past the night: and now with filvery ray The Star of morning usher'd in the day.

The shadows fly before the roseate hours, And the chill dew hangs glittering on the flowers. The pruning hook or humble fpade to wield, The chearful labourer haftens to the field; When to the fleet with many a founding oar The Monarch fails; the natives croud the shore; Their various robes in one bright splendor join, The purple blazes, and the gold-stripes shine; Nor as stern warriors with the quivering lance, Or moon-arch'd bow, Melinda's fons advance; Green boughs of palm with joyful hands they wave; An omen of the meed that crowns the Brave: Fair was the show the royal Barge display'd, With many a flag of gliftning filk array'd, Whose various hues, as nodding thro' the bay, Return'd the lustre of the rising day: And onward as they came, in fovereign state The mighty King amid his Princes fate: His robes the pomp of eastern splendor shew, A proud Tiara decks his lordly brow: The various tiffue shines in every fold, The filken luftre and the rays of gold. His purple mantle boafts the dye of Tyre, And in the fun-beam glows with living fire. A golden chain, the skilful Artist's pride, Hung from his neck; and glittering by his fide

The dagger's hilt of star-bright diamond shone, The girding baldric burns with precious stone; And precious stone in stude of gold enchased, The shaggy velvet of his buskins graced: Wide o'er his head, of various filks inlaid, A fair umbrella cast a grateful shade. A band of menials, bending o'er the prow, Of horn-wreath'd round the crooked trumpets blow; And each attendant barge aloud rebounds A barbarous discord of rejoicing sounds. With equal pomp the Captain leaves the fleet, Melinda's Monarch on the tide to meet: His barge nods on amidst a splendid train, Himself adorn'd in all the pride of Spain: With fair embroidery shone his armed breast, For polish'd steel supply'd the warrior's vest; His fleeves, beneath, were filk of paly blue, Above, more loose, the purple's brightest hue Hung as a scarf in equal gatherings roll'd, With golden buttons and with loops of gold: Bright in the Sun the polish'd radiance burns, And the dimm'd eyeball from the lustre turns.

velvet, all slashed, through which appears the crimson lining, the doublet of crimson sattin, and over it his armour inlaid with gold."

Camoens feems to have his eye on the picture of Gama, which is thus described by Faria y Sou/a. "He is painted with a black cap, cloak and breeches edged with

Of crimfon fattin, dazzling to behold His cassoc swell'd in many a curving fold, The make was Gallic, but the lively bloom Confest the labour of Venetia's loom; Gold was his fword, and warlike trowfers laced With thongs of gold his manly legs embraced. With graceful mien his cap aslant was turn'd, The velvet cap a nodding plume adorn'd. His noble aspect, and the purple's ray, Amidst his train the gallant Chief bewray. The various vestments of the warrior train, Like flowers of various colours on the plain, Attract the pleased beholders wondering eye, And with the splendor of the rainbow vie. Now Gama's bands the quivering trumpet blow, Thick o'er the wave the crowding barges row, The Moorish flags the curling waters sweep, The Lusian mortars thunder o'er the deep; Again the fiery roar heaven's concave tears, The Moors aftonished stop their wounded ears; Again loud thunders rattle o'er the bay, And clouds of fmoke wide-rolling blot the day; The Captain's barge the generous King afcends, His arms the Chief enfold, the Captain bends, A reverence to the scepter'd grandeur due: In filent awe the Monarch's wondering view

Is fixt 'on Vasco's noble mien; the while His thoughts with wonder weigh the Hero's toil. Esteem and friendship with his wonder rise, And free to GAMA all his kingdom lies. Though never son of Lusus' race before Had met his eye, or trod Melinda's shore, To him familiar was the mighty name, And much his talk extols the Lusian fame; How through the vast of Afric's wildest bound Their deathless feats in gallant arms resound; When that fair land where Hesper's offspring reign'd, Their valour's prize the Lusian youth obtain'd. Much still he talk'd, enraptured of the theme, Though but the faint vibrations of their fame To him had ecchoed. Pleased his warmth to view, Convinced his promife and his heart were true, The illustrious GAMA thus his foul exprest And own'd the joy that laboured in his breast: Oh thou, benign, of all the tribes alone, Who feel the rigour of the burning zone, Whose piety, with mercy's gentle eye Beholds our wants, and gives the wish'd supply; Our navy driven from many a barbarous coast, On many a tempest-harrowed ocean tost, e The admiration and friendship of the king of Melinda, so much insisted on by Carnoens, is a judicious imitation of Virgil's Dido. In both cases such preparation was necessary to introduce the long episodes which follow.

At last with thee a kindly refuge finds,
Safe from the fury of the howling winds.
O generous King, may He whose mandate rolls
The circling heavens, and human pride controuls,
May the Great Spirit to thy breast return
That needful aid, bestowed on us forlorn!
And while yon Sun emits his rays divine,
And while the stars in midnight azure shine,
Where'er my sails are stretch'd the world around,

Thy praise shall brighten, and thy name resound.

He spoke; the painted barges swept the flood,
Where, proudly gay, the anchored navy rode;
Earnest the King the lordly fleet surveys;
The mortars thunder, and the trumpets raise
Their martial sounds Melinda's sons to greet,
Melinda's sons with timbrels hail the fleet.
And now no more the sulphury tempest roars,
The boatmen leaning on the rested oars
Breathe short; the barges now at anchor moor'd,
The King, while silence listen'd round, implored
The glories of the Lusian wars to hear,
Whose faintest ecchoes long had pleased his ear:
Their various triumphs on the Afric shore
O'er those who hold the son of Hagar's lore

Fond

Fond he demands, and now demands again Their various triumphs on the western main: Again, ere readiest answer found a place, He asks the story of the Lusian race; What God was founder of the mighty line, Beneath what heaven their land, what shores adjoin; And what their climate, where the finking day Gives the last glimpse of twilight's silvery ray. But most, O Chief, the zealous monarch cries, What raging feas you braved, what louring skies; What tribes, what rites you faw; what favage hate On our rude Afric proved your hapless fate: Oh tell, for lo, the chilly dawning star Yet rides before the morning's purple car; And o'er the wave the fun's bold courfers raise Their flaming fronts; and give the opening blaze; Soft on the glassy wave the zephyrs sleep, And the still billows holy silence keep. Nor less are we, undaunted Chief, prepared To hear thy nation's gallant deeds declared; Nor think, tho' fcorch'd beneath the car of day, Our minds too dull the debt of praise to pay; Melinda's fons the test of greatness know, And on the Lufian race the palm bestow,

If Titan's giant brood with impious arms
Shook high Olympus' brow with rude alarms;
If Theseus and Perithous dared invade
The dismal horrors of the Stygian shade,
Nor less your glory, nor your boldness less
That thus exploring Neptune's last recess
Contemns his waves and tempests. If the thirst
To live in same, though samed for deeds accurst,
Could urge the caitiss, who to win a name
Gave Dian's temple to the wasting shame:
If such the ardour to attain renown,
How bright the lustre of the hero's crown,
Whose deeds of fair emprise his honours raise,
And bind his brows, like thine, with deathless bays!

END OF THE SECOND BOOK.

For a defence of the king of Melinda's learning, ignorantly objected to by Voltaire, fee the Preface.

day to the same of the same the state of the same of the same of of the state of th the state of the same of the s

THE

L U S I A D.

BOOK III.

OH now, Calliope, thy potent aid!
What to the King th' illustrious GAMA faid Cloath in immortal verse. With facred fire
My breast, if e'er it loved thy lore, inspire:
So may the patron of the healing art,
The blooming God, to thee incline his heart;
From thee, the Mother of his darling *Son,
May never wandering thought to Daphne run:

cothoe, who was buried alive by her Father for yielding to the folicitations of Apollo, was by her Lover changed into an Incente tree. The physical meaning of these fables is obvious.

^a Calliepe—the Muse of Epic Poesy, and mother of Orpheus. Daphne, daughter of the river Peneus, slying from Apollo, was turned into the laurel. Clytia was metamorphosed into the Sun-slower, and Leu-

May never Clytia, nor Leucothoe's pride

Henceforth with thee his changeful love divide.

Then aid, O fairest Nymph, my fond desire,

And give my verse the Lusian warlike sire:

Fired by the Song, the listening world shall know

That Aganippe's streams from Tagus slow.

Oh, let no more the flowers of Pindus shine

On thy fair breast, or round thy temples twine:

On Tago's banks a richer chaplet blows,

And with the tuneful God my bosom glows:

I feel, I feel the mighty power infuse,

And bathe my spirit in Aonian dews!

Now filence wooe'd th' illustrious Chief's reply,
And keen attention watch'd on every eye;
When slowly turning with a modest grace,
The noble Vasco raised his manly face;
O mighty king, he cries, at thy b command
The martial story of my native land
I tell; but more my doubtful heart had joy'd
Had other wars my praiseful lips employ'd.
When men the honours of their race commend,
The doubts of strangers on the tale attend:

ample of the great models of antiquity: By adding some characteristical feature of the climate or people, he renders his narrative pleasing, picturesque, and poetical.

b The preface to the speech of Gama, and the description of Europe which sollows, are happy imitations of the manner of Homer. When Camoens describes countries, or musters an army, it is after the ex-

Yet though reluctance faulter on my tongue,
Though day would fail a narrative so long,
Yet well assured no siction's glare can raise,
Or give my country's fame a brighter praise;
Though less, far less, whate'er my lips can say,
Than truth must give it, I thy will obey.

Between that zone, where endless winter reigns, And that, where flaming heat confumes the plains; Array'd in green, beneath indulgent skies, The queen of arts and arms fair Europe lies. Around her northern and her western shores, Throng'd with the finny race old Ocean roars; The midland fea, where tide ne'er fwell'd the waves, Her richest lawns, the southern border, laves. Against the rising morn, the northmost bound The whirling Tanais parts from Afian ground, As tumbling from the Scythian mountains cold Their crooked way the rapid waters hold To dull Mæotis' lake: Her eastern line More to the fouth, the Phrygian waves confine; Those waves, which, black with many a navy, bore The Grecian heroes to the Dardan shore; Where now the feaman rapt in mournful joy Explores in vain the fad remains of Troy.

Wide to the north beneath the pole fhe fpreads; Here piles of mountains rear their rugged heads, Here winds on winds in endless tempests rowl, The valleys figh, the lengthening ecchoes howl. On the rude cliffs with frosty spangles grey, Weak as the twilight gleams the folar ray; Each mountain's breast with snows eternal shines, The streams and seas eternal frost confines. Here dwelt the numerous Scythian tribes of old, A dreadful race! by victor ne'er controul'd, Whose pride maintain'd that theirs the facred earth, Not that of Nile, which first gave man his birth. Here difmal Lapland spreads a dreary wild, Here Norway's wastes where harvest never smil'd, Whose groves of fir in gloomy horror frown, Nod o'er the rocks, and to the tempest groan. Here Scandia's clime her rugged shores extends, And far projected, through the Ocean bends; Whose sons' dread footsteps yet Ausonia 'wears, And yet proud Rome in mournful ruin bears.

Sciences, with every branch of manly literature, were almost unknown. For near two centuries no Poet of note had adorned the Roman Empire. Those arts only, the abuse of which have a certain and fatal tendency to enervate the mind, the arts of Music and Cookery, were passionately cultivated in all the refinements of essembles cultivated in all the refinements of offerminate abuse. The art of war was too laborious for their delicacy, and the generous warmth of heroism and patriotism was incompatible with their esseminacy.

facked, and Italy laid defolate by Alaric, king of the Scandian and other northern tribes. In mentioning this circumstance Camoens has not fallen into the common error of little Poets, who on every occasion bewail the outrage which the Goths and Vandals did to the Arts and Sciences. A complaint founded on ignorance. The Southern nations of Europe were funk into the most contemptible degeneracy. The

When fummer bursts stern winter's icy chain, Here the bold Swede, the Prussian, and the Dane Hoist the white fail and plough the foamy way, Chear'd by whole months of one continual day: Between these shores and Tanais' rushing tide Livonia's fons and Russia's hords reside. Stern as their clime the tribes, whose fires of yore The name, far dreaded, of Sarmatians bore. Where, famed of old, th' Hircinian forest lour'd, Oft feen in arms the Polish troops are pour'd Wide foraging the downs. The Saxon race, The Hungar dextrous in the wild-boar chace, The various nations whom the Rhine's cold wave The Elbe, Amasis, and the Danube lave, Of various tongues, for various princes known, Their mighty Lord the German emperor own. Between the Danube and the lucid tide Where hapless Helle left her name, and died:

On these despicable Sybarites at the North poured her brave and hardy sons, who, though ignorant of polite literature, were possessed of all the manly virtues of the Scythians in a high degree. Under their conquests Europe wore a new sace, which however rude, was infinitely preserable to that which it had lately worn. And however Ignorance may talk of their barbarity, it is to them that England owes her constitution, which, as Montesquieu observes, they brought from the woods of Saxony. The fpirit of gallantry and romantic attachment to the fair fex, which distinguished the Northern Heroes, will make their manners admired, while, considered in the same point, the polished ages of Greece and Rome excite our horror and detestation. To add no more, it is to the irruption of these brave barbarians that modern Europe owes those remains of the spirit of Liberty, and some other of the greatest advantages, which she may at present possess.

a Sybaris, a city in Grecia Magna, whose inhabitants were so effeminate, that they ordered all the cocka to be killed, that they might not be disturbed by their early crowing.

The dreadful god of battles' kindred race, Degenerate now, possess the hills of Thrace. Mount Hæmus here, and Rhodope renown'd, And proud Byzantium, long with empire crown'd; Their ancient pride, their ancient virtue fled, Low to the Turk now bend the fervile head. Here spread the fields of warlike Macedon, And here those happy lands where genius shone In all the arts, in all the Muses' charms, In all the pride of elegance and arms, Which to the heavens resounded Grecia's name, And left in every age a deathless fame. The stern Dalmatians till the neighbouring ground; And where Antenor anchor'd in the found Proud Venice as a queen majestic towers, And o'er the trembling waves her thunder pours. For learning glorious, glorious for the fword, While Rome's proud monarch reign'd the world's dread lord, Here Italy her beauteous landscapes shews; Around her fides his arms old Ocean throws; The dashing waves the ramparts force supply; The hoary Alps high towering to the sky, From shore to shore a rugged barrier spread, And lour destruction on the hostile tread. But now no more her hostile spirit burns, There now the faint in humble vespers mourns;

To heaven more grateful than the pride of war, And all the triumphs of the Victor's car. Onward fair Gallia opens to the view Her groves of olive, and her vineyards blue: Wide spread her harvests o'er the scenes renown'd, Where Julius proudly strode with laurel crown'd. Here Seyn, how fair when glistening to the moon! Rolls his white wave, and here the cold Garoon; Here the deep Rhine the flowery margin laves, And here the rapid Rhone impervious raves. Here the gruff mountains, faithless to the vows Of lost Pyrene drear their cloudy brows; Whence, when of old the flames their woods devour'd, Streams of red gold and melted filver pour'd. And now, as head of all the lordly train Of Europe's realms, appears illustrious Spain. Alas, what various fortunes has she known! Yet ever did her fons her wrongs atone; Short was the triumph of her haughty foes, And still with fairer bloom her honours rose. Against one coast the Punic strand extends, Each shore to close the midland ocean bends, etymology they relate, that by the negligence of some shepherds the antient forests on these mountains were set on sire, and burned with such vehemence, that the melted metals spouted out and ran down from the sides of the hills. The allusion to this old tradition is in the true spirit of Homer and Virgil. C.

Where

Faithless to the vocus of lost Pyrene, &c.—She was daughter to Bebryx, a king of Spain, and concubine to Hercules. Having wandered one day from her lover she was destroyed by wild beasts, on one of the mountains which bear her name. Diodorus Siculus, and others, derive the name of the Pyrenians from πêς, fire. To support which

Where lock'd with land the struggling currents boil, Famed for the godlike Theban's latest toil, Around her shores two various oceans swell. And various nations in her bosom dwell: Such deeds of valour dignify their names, That each the lordly right of honour claims. Proud Arragon, who twice her standard rear'd In conquer'd Naples; and for art revered, Galicia's prudent fons; the fierce Navar, And he far dreaded in the Moorish war, The bold Asturian; nor Sevilia's race, Nor thine, Granada, claim the fecond place. Here too the heroes who command the plain By Betis water'd; here, the pride of Spain, The brave Castilian pauses o'er his sword, His country's dread deliverer and lord. Proud o'er the rest, with splendid wealth array'd, As crown to this wide empire, Europe's head, Fair Lusitania smiles, the western bound, Whose verdant breast the rolling waves furround, Where gentle evening pours her lambent ray, The last pale gleaming of departing day;

benefit of commerce; on which the ocean rushed in, and formed the Mediterranean, the Egean, and Euxin seas.

Hercules, fays the fable, to crown his labours, separated the two mountains Calpe and Abyla, the one now in Spain, the other in Africa, in order to open a canal for the

This, this, O mighty King, the facred earth,
This the loved parent-foil that gave me birth.
And oh, would bounteous heaven my prayer regard,.
And fair fuccess my perilous toils reward,
May that dear land my latest breath receive,
And give my weary bones a peaceful grave.

Sublime the honours of my native land, And high in heaven's regard her heroes stand; By heaven's decree 'twas theirs the first to quell The Moorish tyrants, and from Spain expel; Nor could their burning wilds conceal their flight, Their burning wilds confest the Lusian might. From Lusus famed, whose honour'd name we bear, (The fon of Bacchus or the bold compeer,) The glorious name of Lusitania rose, A name tremendous to the Roman foes, When her bold troops the valiant shepherd led, And foul with rout the Roman eagles fled; When haughty Rome atchiev'd the treacherous blow, That own'd her terror of the matchless foe f. But when no more her Viriatus fought, Age after age her deeper thraldom brought; Her broken fons by ruthless tyrants spurn'd, Her vineyards languish'd, and her pastures mourn'd;

f The assassination of Viriatus. See the note on Book I. p. 13.

Till time revolving raised her drooping head, And o'er the wondering world her conquests spread. Thus rose her power: the lands of lordly Spain Were now the brave Alonzo's wide domain; Great were his honours in the bloody fight, And Fame proclaim'd him champion of the right. And oft the groaning Saracen's proud crest And shatter'd mail his awful force confest. From Calpe's fummits to the Caspian shore Loud-tongued Renown his godlike actions bore. And many a chief from distant regions & came To share the laurels of Alonzo's fame; Yet more for holy faith's unspotted cause Their spears they wielded, than for Fame's applause. Great were the deeds their thundering arms display'd, And still their foremost swords the battle sway'd.

Don Alonzo, king of Spain, apprehensive of the superior number of the Moors, with whom he was at war, demanded affistance from Philip I. of France, and of the duke of Burgundy. According to the military spirit of the nobility of that age, no sooner was his desire known than numerous bodies of troops thronged to his standard. These, in the course of a few years, having shewn signal proofs of their courage, the king distinguished the leaders with different marks of his regard. To Henry, a younger son of the duke of Burgundy he gave his daughter Teresa in marriage, with the sovereignty of the countries to the south of Galicia, commissioning him to enlarge his boundaries by the expulsion of the insidels. Under the government of this great man, who reigned by the title of Count, his dominion was greatly enlarged, and became more rich and populous than before. The two provinces of Entro Minho e Douro, and Fra los Montes, were subdued, with that part of Beira which was held by the Moorish king of Lamege, whom he constrained to pay tribute. Many thousands of Christians, who had either lived in miferable subjection to the Moors, or in defolate independency in the mountains, took shelter under the protection of Count Henry. Great multitudes of the Moors also chose rather to submit and remain in their native country under a mild government, than be exposed to the severities and the continual feuds and feditions of their own governors. These advantages, added to the great fertility of the soil of Henry's dominions, will account for the numerous armies and the frequent wars of the first sovereigns of PorAnd now to honour with distinguish'd meed Each hero's worth the generous king decreed. The first and bravest of the foreign bands Hungaria's younger fon brave Henry 1 stands. To him are given the fields where Tagus flows, And the glad King his daughter's hand bestows; The fair Terefa shines his blooming bride, And owns her father's love, and Henry's pride. With her, besides, the sire confirms in dower Whate'er his fword might rescue from the Moor; And foon on Hagar's race the hero pours His warlike fury—foon the vanquish'd Moors To him far round the neighbouring lands refign, And heaven rewards him with a glorious line. To him is born, heaven's gift, a gallant fon, The glorious founder of the Lusian throne.

h Camoens, in making the founder of the Portuguese monarchy a younger son of the king of Hungary, has followed the old chronologist Galvan. The Spanish and Portuguese historians differ widely in their accounts of the parentage of this gallant stranger. Some bring him from Constantinople, and others from the house of Lorrain. But the clearest and most probable account of him is in the chronicle of Fleury, wherein is preserved a fragment of French history, written by a Benedictine monk in the beginning of the twelsth century, and in the time of Count Henry. By this it appears, that he was a younger son of Henry the only son of Robert the first duke of Burgundy, who was a younger brother of Henry I of France. Fanshaw having an eye to this history, has taken the unwarrantable liberty to alter the fact as mentioned by his author.

Among st these Henry, saith the history,
A younger son of France, and a brave prince,
Had Portugal in lot.—
And the same king did his own daughter tie
To him in wedlock, to infer from thence
His sirmer love.

Nor are historians agreed on the birth of Donna Teresa, the spouse of Count Henry. Brandam, and other Portuguese historians, are at great pains to prove she was the legitimate daughter of Alonzo and the beautiful Ximena de Guzman. But it appears from the more authentic chronicle of Fleury, that Ximena was only his concubine. And it is evident from all the historians, that Donna Urraca, the heires of her father's kingdom, was younger than her half-sister, the wife of Count Henry.

Nor Spain's wide lands alone his deeds attest. Delivered Judah Henry's might 'confest. On Jordan's bank the victor-hero strode. Whose hallowed waters bathed the Saviour-God; And Salem's gate her open folds difplay'd, When Godfrey conquer'd by the hero's aid. But now no more in tented fields opposed, By Tagus' stream his honoured age he closed; Yet still his dauntless worth, his virtue lived, And all the father in the fon furvived. And foon his worth was proved, the parent dame Avow'd a fecond hymeneal flame k. The low-born spouse assumes the monarch's place, And from the throne expels the orphan race. But young Alphonso, like his fires of yore, (His grandsire's virtues as his name he bore)

Deliver'd Judah Henry's might confest.--His expedition to the Holy Land is mentioned by some monkish writers, but from the other parts of his history it is highly improbable. Camoens however shews his judgment in adopting every traditionary circumstance that might give an air of solemnity to his poem.

k Don Alonzo Enriquez, son of Count Henry, was only entered into his third year when his father died. His mother assumed the reins of government, and appointed Don Fernando Perez de Traba to be her minister. When the young prince was in his eighteenth year, some of the nobility, who either envied the power of Don Perez, or were really offended with the reports that were spread of his familiarity with the prince's mother, of his intention to marry her, and to exclude the lawful heir, easily persuaded the young Count to take arms, and assume the sovereignty. A battle ensued, in which the prince was victorious. Teresa it is said, retired into the cassle of Legonasso, where she was taken prisoner by her son, who condemned her to perpetual imprisonment, and ordered chains to be put upon her legs. That Don Alonzo made war against his mother, vanquished her party, and that she died in prison about two years after, A. D. 1130, are certain. But the cause of the war, that his mother was married to, or intended to marry Don Perez, and that she was put in chains, are uncertain.

Arms for the fight, his ravish'd throne to win,
And the laced helmet grasps his beardless chin.
Her fiercest firebrands Civil Discord waved,
Before her troops the lustful mother raved;
Lost to maternal love, and lost to shame,
Unawed she saw heaven's awful vengeance shame;
The brother's sword the brother's bosom tore,
And sad Guimaria's meadows blush'd with gore;
With Lusian gore the Peasant's cot was stain'd,
And kindred blood the facred shrine profaned.

Here, cruel Progne, here, O Jason's wife,
Yet reeking with your childrens' purple life,
Here glut your eyes with deeper guilt than yours;
Here fiercer rage her fiercer rancour pours.
Your crime was vengeance on the faithless fires,
But here ambition with foul lust conspires.
'Twas rage of love, O Scylla, urged the knife'
That robb'd thy father of his fated life;
Here grosser rage the mother's breast instances,
And at her guiltless son the vengeance aims.
But aims in vain; her slaughter'd forces yield,
And the brave youth rides Victor o'er the field.

the fatal lock while her father slept. Minoson this was victorious, but rejected the love of the unnatural daughter, who in despair flung herself from a rock, and in the fall was changed into a lark.

The Scylla here alluded to was, according to fable, the daughter of Nifus king of Megara, who had a purple lock, in which lay the fate of his kingdom. Minos of Crete made war against him, for whom Scylla conceived so violent a passon, that she cut off

No more his subjects lift the thirsty sword, And the glad realm proclaims the youthful Lord. But ah, how wild the noblest tempers run! His filial duty now forfakes the fon; Secluded from the day, in clanking chains His rage the parents aged limbs constrains. Heaven frown'd—Dark vengeance lowring on his brows, And sheath'd in brass the proud Castilian rose, Refolved the rigour to his daughter shewn, The battle should avenge, and blood atone. A numerous host against the prince he sped, The valiant prince his little army led: Dire was the shock; the whizzing javelins sung, The Hauberks rattled, and the bucklers rung. Yet though around the Stripling's facred head By angel hands etherial shields were spread; Though glorious triumph on his valour finiled, Soon on his van the baffled foe recoil'd: With bands more numerous to the field he came, His proud heart burning with the rage of shame. And now in turn Guimaria's lofty wall, That faw his triumph, faw the hero fall; Within the town immured, distrest he lay, To stern Castilia's sword a certain prey. When now the guardian of his infant years, The valiant Egas, as a god appears;

To proud Casteel the suppliant noble bows, And faithful homage for his prince he vows. The proud Casteel accepts his honour'd faith, And peace fucceeds the dreadful scenes of death. Yet well, alas, the generous Egas knew His high-foul'd Prince to man would never fue: Would never stoop to brook the servile stain, To hold a borrow'd, a dependent reign. And now with gloomy aspect rose the day, Decreed the plighted fervile rites to pay; When Egas to redeem his faith's difgrace Devotes himself, his spouse, and infant race. In gowns of white, as fentenced felons clad, When to the stake the sons of guilt are led, With feet unshod they slowly moved along, And from their necks the knotted halters hung. And now, O King, the kneeling Egas cries, Behold my perjured honour's facrifice: If fuch mean victims can atone thine ire, Here let my wife, my babes, myself expire. If generous bosoms such revenge can take, Here let them perish for the father's sake: The guilty tongue, the guilty hands are these, Nor let a common death thy wrath appeale; For us let all the rage of torture burn, But to my Prince, thy son, in friendship turn.

He spoke, and bow'd his prostrate body low,
As one who waits the lifted sabre's blow;
When o'er the block his languid arms are spread,
And death, foretasted, whelms the heart with dread:
So great a Leader thus in humbled state,
So sirm his loyalty, his zeal so great,
The brave Alonzo's kindled ire subdued,
And lost in silent joy the Monarch stood;
Then gave the hand, and sheath'd the hostile sword,
And to such honour honour'd peace "restored."

Oh Lusian faith! oh zeal beyond compare!

What greater danger could the Persian dare,

Whose prince in tears, to view his mangled woe,

Forgot the joy for Babylon's " o'erthrow.

And now the youthful hero shines in arms,

The banks of Tagus eccho war's alarms:

O'er Ourique's wide campaign his ensigns wave,

And the proud Saracen to combat brave.

Though prudence might arraign his fiery rage

'That dared with one, each hundred spears engage,

The Universal Historians having related this story of Egas, add, "All this is very pleasant and entertaining, but we see no sufficient reason to affirm that there is one tyllable of it true"

" When Darius laid Seige to Babylon, one of his Lords, named Zopyrus, having cut off his nose and ears, persuaded the enemy that he had received these indignities from the cruelty of his master. Being appointed to a chief command in Babylon, he betrayed the city to Darius. Vid. Justin.

In heaven's protecting care his courage lies,
And heaven his friend superior force supplies.
Five Moorish Kings against him march along,
Ismar the noblest of the armed throng;
Yet each brave Monarch claim'd the Soldier's name,
And far o'er many a land was known to same.
In all the beauteous glow of blooming 'years,
Beside each King a warrior Nymph appears;
Each with her sword her valiant Lover guards,
With smiles inspires him, and with smiles rewards.
Such was the valour of the beauteous 'Maid,
Whose warlike arm proud Ilion's fate delay'd.
Such in the field the virgin warriors shone,
Who drank the limpid wave of 'Thermodon.

'Twas morn's still hour, before the dawning grey
The stars' bright twinkling radiance died away;
When lo, resplendent in the heaven serene,
High o'er the Prince the sacred Cross was seen;
The godlike Prince with faith's warm glow inflamed,
Oh, not to me, my bounteous God, exclaim'd!

Quales Thréiciæ cum flumina Thermodontis Pulfant, et pictis bellantur Amazones armis : Scu circum Hippolyten, seu cum se Martia curru

Penthesilea refert: magneque ululante tumultu

Faminea exultant lunatis agmina peltis.

VIRG. En. IX.

[•] The Spanish and Portuguese histories afford several instances of the Moorish Chiefs being attended in the field of battle by their mistresses, and of the romantic gallantry and Amazonian courage of these ladies.

P Penthesilea, Queen of the Amazons, who, after having signalized her valour at the seige of Troy, was killed by Achilles.

⁹ Thermodon, a river of Scythia in the country of the Amazons.

Oh, not to me, who well thy grandeur know, But to the Pagan herd thy wonders shew.

The Lusian host, enraptured, mark'd the sign That witness'd to their Chief the aid divine: Right on the foe they shake the beamy lance, And with firm strides, and heaving breasts, advance: Then burst the silence, Hail, O King, they cry; Our King, our King, the ecchoing dales reply: Fired at the found, with fiercer ardour glows The heaven-made Monarch; on the wareless foes Rushing, he speeds his ardent bands along: So when the chace excites the rustic throng, Roused to fierce madness by their mingled cries On the wild bull the red-eyed mastiff flies. The stern-brow'd tyrant trusts his potent horns, Around and round the nimble mastiff turns; Now by the neck, now by the gory fides He hangs, and all his bellowing rage derides: In vain his eye-balls burn with living fire, In vain his nostrils clouds of smoke respire, His gorge torn out, down falls the furious prize With o hollow thundering found, and raging dies:

o It may, perhaps, be agreeable to the Reader, to fee the description of a Bull-fight, as managed by Homer.

As when a lion, rushing from his den,
Amidst the plain of some wide-water'd fen,
(Where num'rous oxen, as at ease they feed,
At large expatiute o'er the ranker mead;)
Leaps on the herds before the herdsman's eyes;
The trembling herdsman far to distance sties:

Thus on the Moors the hero rush'd along, Th' aftonish'd Moors in wild confusion throng; They fnatch their arms, the hasty trumpet founds, With horrid yell the dread alarm rebounds; The warlike tumult maddens o'er the plain, As when the flame devours the bearded grain: The nightly flames the whiftling winds inspire, Fierce through the braky thicket pours the fire: Rous'd by the crackling of the mounting blaze From sleep the shepherds start in wild amaze; They fnatch their cloaths with many a woeful cry, And scatter'd devious to the mountains fly: Such fudden dread the trembling Moors alarms, And thus confused they fnatch the nearest arms; Yet flight they fcorn, and eager to engage They four their foamy steeds, and trust their furious rage: Amidst the horror of the headlong shock, With foot unshaken as the living rock The Lusian hero stands; the purple wounds Gush horrible, deep groaning rage resounds; Reeking behind the Moorish backs appear The shining point of many a Lusian spear;

Some lordly bull (the rest dispers'd and sted)
He singles out, arrests, and lays him dead.
Thus from the rage of Jove-like Hector sterv
All Greece in heaps; but one he seiz'd, and sterv; Mycenian Periphas.

POPE. IL. XV.

The mailcoats, hauberks, and the harness steel'd, Bruis'd, hackt, and torn, lie scatter'd o'er the sield; Beneath the Lusian sweepy force o'erthrown, Crush'd by their batter'd mails the wounded groan; Burning with thirst they draw their panting breath, And curse their Prophet as they writhe in death. Arms sever'd from the trunks still grasp the 'steel, Heads gasping rowl; the sighting squadrons reel; Fainty and weak with languid arms they close, And staggering grapple with the staggering foes. So when an oak falls headlong on the lake, The troubled waters slowly settling shake:

r There is a passage in Xenophon, upon which perhaps Camoens had his eye. Επελδί ἐληξεν ἡ μάχη, παρῆν ἰδείν, τὰν μέν γῆν αϊμαλι πεφυρμένην, &c. "When the battle was over one might behold, through the whole extent of the field, the ground purpled with blood, the bodies of friends and enemies stretched over each other, the shields pierced, the spears broken, and the drawn swords, some scattered on the carth, some plunged in the bosoms of the slain, and some yet grasped in the hands of the dead soldiers."

As it was necessary in the presace to give a character of the French translation of the Lusiad, some support of that character is necessary in the notes. To point out every instance of the unpoetical taste of Castera, were to give his paraphrase of every singular in Camoens. His management of this battle will give an idea of his manner, it is therefore transcribed. "Le Portugais heurte impetuejement let foldats d'Ismar, les renverse et leur ouvre le sein à coups de lance; on se renverse, en se choque avec une surre qui ébranleroit le sommet un montagnes. La terre tremble sous les sas des coursiers sougueux; l'impitoyable Erinnys weit des bles fures enormes et de conps dignes d'elles: les guerriers de Lusus brisent, coupent, taillent, ensencent plastrons, armures, boucliers, cui-rasses et turbans; la Parque étend ses ailes agreuses sur les Mauritains, l'un expire en mordant la poussière, l'autre implore le secours de son prophete; têtes jambes et bras volent et bondissent de toutes parts, l'ail n'apperçoit que visages couverts d'une paleur livide, que corps décrivés et qu'entrailles palpitantes." Had Castera seriously intended to burlesque his Author he could scarcely have better succeeded. As translation cannot convey a perfect idea of an author's manner, it is therefore not attempted. The attack was with juch fury that it shook the tops of the mountains: This bombast, and the wretched anticlimax ending with turbans, are not in the original; from which indeed the whole is extremely wide. Had he added any poeti-cal image, any flower to the embroidery of his Author, the increase of the richness of the tiffue would have rendered his work more pleasing. It was therefore his interest to do fo. But it was not in the feelings of Castera to translate the Lusiad with the spirit of CaSo faints the languid combat on the plain,

And fettling staggers o'er the heaps of slain.
Again the Lusian fury wakes its fires,
The terror of the Moors new strength inspires:
The scatter'd few in wild confusion fly,
And total rout resounds the yelling cry.
Defiled with one wide sheet of reeking gore,
The verdure of the lawn appears no more:
In bubbling streams the lazy currents run,
And shoot red slames beneath the evening sun.
With spoils enrich'd, with glorious trophies 'crown'd
The heaven-made Sovereign on the battle ground

3 This memorable battle was fought in the plains of Ourique, in 1139. The engagement lasted fix hours; the Moors were totally routed with incredible slaughter. On the field of battle Alonzo was proclaimed king of Portugal. The Portuguese writers have given many fabulous accounts of this victory. Some affirm, that the Moorish army amounted to 380,000, others, 480,000, and others swell it to 600,000, whereas Don Alonzo's did not exceed 13,000. Miracles must also be added. Alonzo, they tell us, being in great perplexity, fat down to comfort his mind by the perusal of the Holy Scriptures. Having read the story of Gi-deon, he sunk into a deep sleep, in which he faw a very old man in a remarkable drefs. come into his tent, and assure him of victory: His chamberlain coming in, waked him, and told him there was an old man very importunate to speak with him. Don Alonzo erdered him to be brought in, and. no fooner faw him than he knew him to be the old man whom he had feen in his dream. This venerable person acquainted him, that he was a fisherman, and had led a life of penance for fixty years on an adjacent rock, where it had been revealed to him, that if the Count marched his army the next mornar P ing, as foon as he heard a certain bell ring, he should receive the strongest assurance of victory. Accordingly, at the ringing of the bell, the Count put his army in motion, and fuddenly beheld in the eastern sky, the figure of the Cross, and Christ upon it, who promised him a complete victory, and commanded him to accept the title of King, if it was offered him by the army. The fame. writers add, that as a standing memorial of this miraculous event, Don Alonzo changed the arms which his father had given, of a cross azure in a field argent, for five escutcheons, each charged with five hezants, in memory of the wounds of Christ. Others affert, that he gave in a field argent five efcutcheons azure, in the form of a Cross, each charged with five bezants argent, placed falterwise, with a point sable, in memory of five wounds he himself received, and of five Moorish kings slain in the battle. There is an old record, said to be written by Don Alonzo, in which the story of the vision is related upon his Majesty's oath. The Spanish Critics, however, have discovered many inconfissencies in it. They find the language intermixed with phrases not then in use: it bears the date of the year of our Lord, at a time when that are had not been inThree days encampt, to rest his weary train, Whose dauntless valour drove the Moors from Spain.

BOOK III.

And now in honour of the glorious day,
When five proud Monarchs fell his vanquish'd prey,
On his broad buckler, unadorn'd before,
Placed as a Cross, five azure shields he 'wore, troduced into Spain; and John, Bishop of Coimbra, signs as a witness before John, Metrapolitan of Braja, which is contrary to ecclesiastical rule. These circumstances, however, are not mentioned to prove the falschood of the vision, but to vindicate the character of Don Alonzo from any share in the oath which passes under his name. The truth is, the Portuguese were always unwilling to pay any homage to the King of Castile. They adorned the battle which gave birth to their Monarchy, with mira-cle, and the new Sovereignty with a command from heaven, circumstances extremely agreeable both to the military pride and the superstition of these times. The regal dignity and constitution of the Monarchy, however, were not fettled till about fix years after the battle of Ourique. For mankind, fay the Universal Historians, were not then so ignorant and barbarous, as to suffer a change of government to be made without any farther ceremony, than a tumultuous huzza. An account of the coronation of the first king of Portugal, and the principles of liberty which then prevailed in that kingdom, are worthy of our attention. The arms of Don Alonzo having been attended with glorious succees, in 1145 he called an assembly of the Prelates, Nobility, and Commons, at Lamego. When the affembly opened, he appeared, feated on the throne, but without any other marks of regal dignity. Laurence de Viegas then demanded of the assembly, whether, according to the election on the field of battle at Ourique, and the briefs of l'ope Eugenius III. they chused to have Don Alonzo Enriquez for their king? To this they answered they were willing. He then demanded, if they defired the Monarchy should be elective or hereditary, They declared their intention to be, that the crown should descend to the heirs male of Alonzo. Laurence de Viegas then asked, "Is it your pleasure that he be invested with the ensigns of Royalty? He was answered in the affirmative, and the Archbishop of Braga placed the crown upon his head, the king having his fword drawn in his hand. As foon as crowned Alonzo thus addressed the af-fembly; "Blessed be God, who has always affisted me, and has enabled me, with this fword, to deliver you from all your enemies. I shall ever wear it for your defence. You have made me a king, and it is but just that you should share with me in taking care of the state. I am your king, and as such let us make laws to secure the happiness of this kingdom." Eighteen short statutes were then framed and affented to by the people. Laurence de Viegas at length proposed the great question, Whether it was their pleasure that the king should go to Leon, do homage and pay tribute to that prince, or to any other. Upon which, every man drawing his fword, cried with a loud voice, "We are free, and our king is free; we owe our liberty to our courage. If the king shall at any time submit to such an act, he deserves death, and shall not reign either over us, or among us." The king rising up, approved this declaration, and declared, that if any of his descendents consented to fuch a submission, he was unworthy to succeed, and should be reputed incapable of wearing the crown.

t Fanshaw's translation of this is curious. He is literal in the circumstances, but the debasements marked in italic are his own:

In these sive shields he paints the recompence (Os trinta Dinbeiros; the thirty Denarii, says Camoens.) In grateful memory of the heavenly fign, The pledge of conquest by the aid divine:

Nor long his faulchion in the scabbard slept, His warlike arm increasing laurels reapt .: From Leyra's walls the baffled Ismar flies, And strong Arroncha falls his conquer'd prize; That honour'd town, through whose Elysian groves Thy fmooth and limpid wave, O Tagus, roves. Th' illustrious Santarene confest his power, And vanquish'd Mafra yields her proudest tower. The Lunar mountains faw his troops display Their marching banners and their brave array: To him submits fair Cintra's cold domain, The foothing refuge of the Nayad train. When Love's fweet fnares the pining Nymphs would shun: Alas, in vain from warmer climes they run: The cooling shades awake the young desires, And the cold fountains cherish love's soft fires. And thou, famed Lisbon, whose embattled wall Rose by the hand that wrought proud Ilion's " fall;

For which the Lord was fold, in various ink Writing bis biffory, who did dispense Such savour to him, more then heart could think.

(Writing the remembrance of him, by whom he was favoured, in various colours. Camoens.)

In every of the five he paints five-pence So fums the thirty by a cinque-fold cinque Accounting that which is the center, twice, Of the five cinques, which he doth place crofs-wife.

" The tradition, that Liston was built by Ulysses, and thence called Olyssipolis, is as common as, and of equal authority with that, which says, that Brute landed a colony of Trojans in England, and gave the name of Britannia to the island.

Thou queen of Cities, whom the seas obey, Thy dreaded ramparts own'd the Hero's fway. Far from the north a warlike navy bore From Elbe, from Rhine, and Albion's mifty " shore; To refcue Salem's long-polluted shrine Their force to great Alonzo's force they join: Before Ulysses' walls the navy rides, The joyful Tagus laves their pitchy fides. Five times the Moon her empty horns conceal'd, Five times her broad effulgence shone reveal'd, When, wrapt in clouds of dust, her mural pride Falls thundering,-black the fmoaking breach yawns wide. As when th' imprison'd waters burst the mounds, And roar, wide fweeping, o'er the cultured grounds; Nor cot nor fold withstand their furious course; So headlong rush'd along the Hero's force. The thirst of vengeance the assailants fires, The madness of despair the Moors inspires;

The conquest of Lisbon was of the utmost importance to the infant Monarchy. It is one of the finest ports in the world, and ere the invention of cannon, was of great strength. The old Moorish wall was stanked by seventy-seven towers, was about fix miles in length, and sourceen in circumference. When beseiged by Don Alonzo, according to some, it was garrisoned by an army of 200,000 men. This, not to say impossible, is highly incredible. However, that it was strong and well garrisoned is certain, as also that Alonzo owed the conquest of it to a fleet of adventurers, who were going to the Holy Land, the greatest part of which were English. One Udal op Rbys, in his tour through Portugal, fays, that Alonzo gave them Almada, on the side of the Tagus opposite to Lisbon, and that Villa Franca was peopled by them, which they called Cornualla, either in honour of their native country, or from the rich meadows in its neighbourhood, where immense herds of cattle are kept, as in the English Cornwall.

Each lane, each street resounds the conflict's roar, And every threshold reeks with tepid gore.

Thus fell the City, whose unconquer'd * towers Defy'd of old the banded Gothic powers;
Whose harden'd nerves in rigorous climates train'd The savage courage of their souls sustain'd:
Before whose sword the sons of Ebro sled,
And Tagus trembled in his oozy bed;
Aw'd by whose arms the lawns of Betis shore
The name Vandalia from the Vandals bore.

When Lisbon's towers before the Lusian fell,
What fort, what rampart might his arms repell!
Estremadura's region owns him Lord,
And Torres-vedras bends beneath his sword;
Obidos humbles, and Alamquer yields,
Alamquer famous for her verdant fields,
Whose murmuring rivulets cheer the traveller's way,
As the chill waters o'er the pebbles stray.
Elva the green, and Moura's fertile dales,
Fair Serpa's tillage and Alcazar's vales
Not for himself the Moorish peasant sows;
For Lusian hands the yellow harvest glows:

^{*} Unconquer'd towers—This affertion of Camoens is not without foundation, for it Goth, got possession of Lisbon.

And you, fair lawns, beyond the Tagus' wave, Your golden burdens for Alonzo fave; Soon shall his thundering might your wealth reclaim, And your glad valleys hail their monarch's name,

Nor fleep his captains while the fovereign wars; The brave Giraldo's sword in conquest shares, Evora's frowning walls, the castled hold Of that proud Roman chief, and rebel bold, Sertorius dread, whose labours still * remain; Two hundred arches, stretch'd in length, sustain The marble duct, where, glistening to the fun, Of filver hue the shining waters run. Evora's frowning walls now shake with fear, And yield obedient to Giraldo's spear. Nor rests the monarch while his servants toil, Around him still increasing trophies smile, And deathless fame repays the hapless fate That gives to human life fo short a date. Proud Beja's castled walls his fury storms, And one red flaughter every lane deforms. The ghosts, whose mangled limbs; yet scarcely cold, Heapt fad Trancoso's streets in carnage voltd, Appealed, the vengeance of their flaughter fee, And hail th' indignant king's fevere decree.

The aqueduct of Sertorius, here mentioned, is one of the grandest remains of Portugal, about A. D. 1540.

Palmela

Palmela trembles on her mountain's height, And fea-laved Zambra owns the hero's might. Nor these alone confest his happy star, Their fated doom produced a noble war. Badaja's king, an haughty Moor, beheld His towns befieged, and hafted to the field. Four thousand coursers in his army neigh'd, Unnumber'd spears his infantry display'd: Proudly they march'd, and glorious to behold. In filver belts they shone, and plates of gold. Along a mountain's fide fecure they trod, Steep on each hand, and rugged was the road; When as a bull, whose lustful veins betray The mad'ning tumult of inspiring May; If, when his rage with fiercest ardour glows, When in the shade the fragrant heifer lows, If then perchance his jealous burning eye Behold a careless traveller wander by, With dreadful bellowing on the wretch he flies, The wretch defenceless torn and trampled dies. So rush'd Alonzo on the gaudy train,

And pour'd victorious o'er the mangled flain;

The mountain ecchoes with the wild affright

And dash from rock to rock to shun the foe.

Of flying squadrons, down their arms they throw,

The royal Moor precipitates in flight,

III

The foe! what wonders may not virtue dare! But fixty horsemen waged the conquering war. The warlike monarch still his toil renews, New conquest still each victory pursues. To him Badaja's lofty gates expand, And the wide region owns his dread command. When now enraged proud Leon's king beheld Those walls subdued which saw his troops expell'd; Enraged he saw them own the victor's sway, And hems them round with battalous array, With generous ire the brave Alonzo glows, By heaven unguarded, on the numerous foes He rushes, glorying in his wonted force, And spurs with headlong rage his furious horse; The combat burns, the fnorting courfer bounds, And paws impetuous by the iron mounds: O'er gasping foes and sounding bucklers trod The raging steed, and headlong as he rode Dash'd the fierce monarch on a rampire bar-Low groveling in the dust, the pride of war, The great Alonzo lies. The captive's fate Succeeds, alas, the pomp of regal state. " Let iron dash his limbs," his mother cried, " And steel revenge my chains:" she spoke, and died;

² The history of this battle wants authenticity.

And heaven affented — Now the hour was come, And the dire curse was fallen Alonzo's b doom.

No more, O Pompey, of thy fate complain, No more with forrow view thy glory's stain; Though thy tall standards tower'd with lordly pride Where northern Phasis rolls his icy tide; Though hot Syene, where the fun's fierce ray Begets no shadow, own'd thy conquering sway; Though from the tribes that shiver in the gleam Of cold Bootes' watery glistening team; To those who parch'd beneath the burning line, In fragrant shades their feeble limbs recline, The various languages proclaim'd thy fame, And trembling own'd the terrors of thy name; Though rich Arabia and Sarmatia bold, And Colchis, famous for the fleece of gold; Though Judah's land, whose facred rites implored The One true God, and, as he taught, adored;

fractured in the battle, was reflored, on condition that as foon as he was able to mount on horseback, he should come to Leon, and in person do homage for his dominions. This condition, so contrary to his coronation agreement, he found means to avoid. He ever after affected to drive in a calash, and would never mount on horseback more. This his natural and afterwards political infirmity, the superstitious of those days ascribed to the curses of his mother.

b As already observed, there is no authentic proof that Don Alonzo used such severity to his mother as to put her in chains. Brandan says it was reported that Don Alonzo was born with both his legs growing together, and that he was cured by the prayers of his tutor Egas Nunio. Legendary as this may appear, this however is deduceable from it, that from his birth there was something amis about his legs. When he was prisoner to his son in law Don Fernando king of Leon, he recovered his liberty ere his leg, which was

Though Cappadocia's realm thy mandate fway'd, And base Sophenia's sons thy nod obey'd; Though vext Cicilia's pirates wore thy bands, And those who cultured fair Armenia's lands, Where from the facred mount two rivers flow, And what was Eden to the Pilgrim shew; Though from the vast Atlantic's bounding wave To where the northern tempests howl and rave Round Taurus' lofty brows: though vast and wide The various climes that bended to thy pride; No more with pining anguish of regret Bewail the horrors of Pharfalia's fate: For great Alonzo, whose superior name Unequal'd victories confign to fame, The great Alonzo fell-like thine his woe; From nuptial kindred came the fatal blow.

When now the hero, humbled in the dust,
His crime atoned, confest that heaven was just,
Again in splendor he the throne ascends:
Again his bow the Moorish chieftain bends.
Wide round th' embattled gates of Santarecn
Their shining spears and banner'd moons are seen.
But holy rites the pious king preferr'd;
The Martyr's bones on Vincent's Cape interr'd,

(His fainted name the Cape shall ever bear) To Lisbon's walls he brought with votive care. And now the monarch, old and feeble grown, Refigns the faulchion to his valiant son. O'er Tagus' waves the youthful hero past, And bleeding hofts before him shrunk aghast. Choak'd with the slain, with Moorish carnage dy'd, Sevilia's river roll'd the purple tide. Burning for victory the warlike boy Spares not a day to thoughtless rest or joy. Nor long his wish unsatisfied remains: With the besiegers' gore he dies the plains That circle Beja's wall: yet still untamed, With all the fierceness of despair inflamed, The raging Moor collects his distant might; Wide from the shores of Atlas' starry height, From Amphelusia's cape, and Tingia's bay, Where stern Antæus held his brutal sway, The Mauritanian trumpet founds to arms, And Juba's realm returns the hoarse alarms; The fwarthy tribes in burnish'd armour shine, Their warlike march Abeyla's shepherds join. The great Miramolin on Tagus' shores Far o'er the coast his banner'd thousands pours;

Tu quoque littoribus nostris, Æneïa nutrix,
 Æternam moriens famam, Caïeta dedisti.
 VIRG. EN. VII.

Twelve kings and one beneath his enfigns stand, And wield their fabres at his dread command. The plundering bands far round the region hafte, The mournful region lies a naked waste. And now enclosed in Santareen's high towers The brave Don Sanco shuns th' unequal powers; A thousand arts the furious Moor pursues, And ceaseless still the fierce assault renews. Huge clefts of rock, from horrid engines whirl'd, In fmouldering volleys on the town are hurl'd; The brazen rams the lofty turrets shake, And mined beneath the deep foundations quake; But brave Alonzo's fon, as danger grows, His pride inflamed, with rifing courage glows; Each coming storm of missile darts he wards, Each nodding turret, and each port he guards.

In that fair city, round whose verdant meads
The branching river of Mondego spreads,
Long worn with warlike toils, and bent with years
The king reposed, when Sanco's fate he hears.
His limbs forget the feeble steps of age,
And the hoar warrior burns with youthful rage.
His daring Veterans, long to conquest train'd,
He leads—the ground with Moorish blood is stain'd;

Turbans

Turbans, and robes of various colours wrought,
And shiver'd spears in streaming carnage float.
In harness gay lies many a weltering steed,
And low in dust the groaning masters bleed.
As proud Miramolin in horror defled,
Don Sanco's javelin stretch'd him with the dead.
In wild dismay, and torn with gushing wounds
The rout wide scatter'd fly the Lusian bounds.
Their hands to heaven the joyful victors raise,
And every voice resounds the song of praise;
"Nor was it stumbling chance, nor human might,
"Twas guardian heaven," they sung, "that ruled the fight."

This blifsful day Alonzo's glories crown'd;
And pale difease soon gave the secret wound;
Her icy hand his feeble limbs invades,
And pining languor through his vitals spreads.
The glorious monarch to the tomb descends,
A nation's grief the funeral torch attends.
Each winding shore for thee, Alonzo, mourns, Alonzo's name each woful bay returns;

d Miramolin, not the name of a person, but a title, quasi, Soldan. The Arabs call it Emir-Almounini, the Emperor of the Faithful.

In this poetical exclamation, exprefive of the forrow of Portugal on the death of Alonzo, Camoens has happily imitated fome passages of Virgil.

Ipsa te, Tityre, finus,
Ipsa te fontes, ipsa bac arbusta cocabant.

Ect. 1.

Eurydican vox ipsa et frigida ling:

[—] Eurydicen vox ipfa et frigida lingua.

Ab miseram Eurydicen, anima sugiente, vocabat:

Eurydicen toto referebant flumine vipa.
G. 1v.

⁻ littus, Ilyla, Ilyla, omne fonaret. Ect. vi

For thee the rivers figh their groves among,
And funeral murmurs wailing, roll along;
Their fwelling tears o'erflow the wide campaign;
With floating heads, for thee, the yellow grain,
For thee the willow bowers and copfes weep,
As their tall boughs lie trembling on the deep;
Adown the streams the tangled vine-leaves flow,
And all the landscape wears the look of woe.
Thus o'er the wondering world thy glories spread,
And thus thy mournful people bow the head;
While still, at eve, each dale Alonzo sighs,
And, oh, Alonzo! every hill replies;
And still the mountain ecchoes trill the lay,
Till blushing morn brings on the noiseful day.

The youthful Sanco to the throne fucceeds,
Already far renown'd for valorous deeds;
Let Betis' tinged with blood his prowefs tell,
And Beja's lawns, where boaftful Afric fell.
Nor lefs when king his martial ardour glows,
Proud Sylves' royal walls his troops enclofe!
Fair Sylves' lawns the Moorish peasant plough'd,
Her vineyards cultured, and her valleys sow'd;
But Lisbon's monarch reapt. The winds of ' heaven
Roar'd high—and headlong by the tempest driven,

The Portuguese, in their wars with the Moors, were several times assisted by the

In Tagus' breast a gallant navy sought
The sheltering port, and glad assistance brought.
The warlike crew, by Frederic the Red,
To rescue Judah's prostrate land were led;
When Guido's troops, by burning thirst subdued,
To Saladine the foc for mercy sued.
Their vows were holy, and the cause the same,
To blot from Europe's shores the Moorish name.
In Sanco's cause the gallant navy joins,
And royal Sylves to their force resigns.
Thus sent by heaven a forcign naval band
Gave Lisbon's ramparts to the Sire's command.

Nor Moorish trophies did alone adorn
The Hero's name; in warlike camps though born,
Though fenced with mountains, Leon's martial race
Smile at the battle-sign, yet foul disgrace
To Leon's haughty sons his sword atchieved;
Proud Tui's neck his servile yoke received;
And far around falls many a wealthy town,
O valiant Sanco, humbled to thy frown.

While thus his laurels flourish'd wide and fair He dies: Alonzo reigns, his much-loved heir.

the troops of which nation were, according to agreement, rewarded with the plunder, which was exceeding rich, of the city of Silves. Nuniz de Leon as cronicas das Reisde Port.

Alcazar

Alcazar lately conquer'd from the Moor. Reconquer'd, streams with the defenders' gore.

Alonzo dead, another Sanco reigns: Alas, with many a figh the land complains! Unlike his Sire, a vain unthinking boy, His fervants now a jarring fway enjoy. As his the power, his were the crimes of those Whom to dispense that sacred power he chose. By various counfels waver'd and confused, By feeming friends, by various arts abused; Long undetermined, blindly rash at last, Enraged, unmann'd, untutor'd by the past. Yet not like Nero, cruel and unjust, The flave capricious of unnatural lust. Nor had he finiled had flames confumed his Troy; Nor could his people's groans afford him joy; Nor did his woes from female manners fpring, Unlike the 8 Syrian, or Sicilia's king. No hundred cooks his costly meal prepared, As heapt the board when Rome's proud tyrant hared. Nor dared the artist hope his ear to gain, By new-form'd arts to point the stings of pain.

⁸ Unlike the Syrian - Sardinapalus. h --- When Rome's proud tyrant far'd .--- Heliogabalus, infamous for his gluttony. Alluding to the history of Phalaris.

But proud and high the Lusian spirit soar'd, And ask'd a godlike hero for their Lord. To none accustom'd but an hero's sway, Great must be whom that bold race obey.

Complaint, loud murmur'd, every city fills,
Complaint, loud murmur'd, vibrates through the hills.
Alarm'd, Bolonia's warlike Earl 'awakes,
And from his liftless brother's minions takes
The awful sceptre.—Soon was joy restored,
And soon, by just succession, Lisbon's Lord,
Beloved, Alonzo named the bold, he reigns;
Nor may the limits of his Sire's domains

i Camoens, who was quite an enthusiast for the honour of his country, has in this instance disguised the truth of history. Don Sancho was by no means the weak Prince here represented, nor did the miseries of his reign proceed from himself. The clergy were the fole authors of his and the public calamities. The Roman See was then in the height of its power, which it exerted in the most tyrannical manner. The ecclefiastical courts had long claimed the fole right to try an ecclesiastic, and to prohibit a Priest to fay mass for a twelvemonth, was by the brethren his judges, esteemed a sufficient punishment for murder, or any other capital crime. Alonzo II. the father of Don Sancho, attempted to establish the authority of the King's courts of justice over the offending Clergy. For this the Archbishop of Braga excommunicated Gonzalo Mendez, the Chancellor, and Honorius the Pope excommunicated the King, and put his dominions under an interdict. The ex-terior offices of Religion were suspended, the vulgar sell into the utmost dissoluteness of ananners; Mahommedism made great advances, and public confusion every where prevailed. By this policy the Holy Church constrained the nobility to urge the King to a sull submission to the Papal chair. While a negotiation for this purpose was on foot Alonzo died, and lest his son to struggle with an enraged and powerful Clergy. Don Sancho was just, affable, brave, and an enamoured husband. On this last virtue faction first fixed its envenomed fangs. The Queen was accused of arbitrary influence over her husband, and, according to the superstition of that age, she was believed to have disturbed his senses by an enchanted draught. Such of the nobility as declared in the King's favour were stigmatized, and rendered odious, as the creatures of the Queen. The confusions which enfued were fomented by Alonzo, Earl of Bologne, the King's brother, by whom the King was accused as the author of them. In short, by the affistance of the Clergy and Pope Inno-cent IV. Sancho was deposed, and soon after he died at Toledo. The beautiful Queen, Donna Mencia, was feized upon, and conveyed away by one Raymond Portocarrero, and was never heard of more. Such are the triumphs of Faction!

THE LUSIAD. BOOK IT.

122

Confine his mounting spirit. When he led His fmiling Confort to the bridal bed, Algarbia's realm, he faid, shall prove thy dower, And foon Algarbia conquer'd own'd his power. The vanquish'd Moor with total rout expell'd, All Lusus' shores his might unrivall'd held. And now brave Diniz reigns, whose noble fire Bespoke the genuine lineage of his Sire. Now heavenly peace wide waved her olive bough. Each vale display'd the labours of the plough. And fmiled with joy: the rocks on every shore Resound the dashing of the merchant-oar. Wife laws are form'd, and constitutions weigh'd, And the deep-rooted base of Empire laid. Not Ammon's fon with larger heart bestow'd, Not fuch the grace to him the Muses owed. From Helicon the Muses wing their way, Mondego's flowery banks invite their stay. Now Coimbra shines Minerva's proud abode; And fired with joy, Parnassus' bloomy God Beholds another dear-loved Athens rife, And spread her laurels in indulgent skies: Her wreath of laurels ever green he twines With threads of gold, and Baccaris * adjoins.

Cingite, ne vati noceat mala lingua futuro.
VIRG. Ecl. VII.

herb to which the Druids and ancient Poets afcribed magical virtues.

Here castle walls in warlike grandeur lour,
Here cities swell and losty temples tower:
In wealth and grandeur each with other vies;
When old and loved the parent-monarch dies.
His son, alas, remiss in filial deeds,
But wise in peace and bold in fight, succeeds,
The fourth Alonzo: Ever arm'd for war
He views the stern Casteel with watchful care.
Yet when the Lybian nations crost the main,
And spread their thousands o'er the fields of Spain,
The brave Alonzo drew his awful steel
And sprung to battel for the proud Casteel.

When Babel's haughty Empress bared the sword,
And o'er Hydaspes' lawns her legions pour'd;
When dreadful Attila, to whom was 'given
That fearful name, the Scourge of angry heaven,
The fields of trembling Italy o'erran
With many a Gothic tribe and northern clan;
Not such unnumber'd banners then were seen,
As now in fair Tartesia's dales convene;
Numidia's bow and Mauritania's spear,
And all the might of Hagar's race was here;

Attila, a king of the Huns, surnamed The Scourge of God. He lived in the fifth century. He may be reckoned among the greatest conquerors.

Granada's mongrels join their numerous hoft, To those who dared the seas from Lybia's coast. Awed by the fury of fuch ponderous force The proud Castilian tries each hoped resource; Yet not by terror for himself inspired, For Spain he trembled, and for Spain was fired. His much-loved bride his messenger he. " fends, And to the hostile Lusian lowly bends. The much-loved daughter of the King implored,. Now fues her father for her wedded Lord. The beauteous dame approach'd the palace gate, Where her great Sire was throned in regal state: On her fair face deep-settled grief appears, And her mild eyes were bathed in gliftening tears; Her careless ringlets, as a mourner's, flow Adown her shoulders and her breasts of snow: A fecret transport through the father ran, While thus, in fighs, the royal bride began:

And know'st thou not, O warlike King, she cry'd, That furious Afric pours her peopled tide; Her barbarous nations o'er the fields of Spain?

Morocco's Lord commands the dreadful train.

m His much-loved bride—The Princess Mary. She was a Lady of great beauty and virtue, but was exceedingly ill used by her husband, who was violently attached to his mistresses, though he owed his crown to the assistance of his father-in-law, the king of Portugal. Ne'er fince the furges bathed the circling coast, Beneath one standard march'd so dread an host: Such the dire fierceness of their brutal rage; Pale are our bravest youth as palsied age. By night our father's shades confess their " fear; Their shrieks of terror from the tombs we hear: To stem the rage of these unnumber'd bands, Alone, O Sire, my gallant husband stands; His little host alone their breasts oppose. To the barb'd darts of Spain's innumerous foes: Then haste, O Monarch, thou whose conquering spear Has chill'd Malucca's fultry waves with fear; Haste to the rescue of distress'd Casteel; (Oh! be that finile thy dear affection's feal!) And speed, my father, ere my husband's fate Be fixt, and I, deprived of regal state, Be left in captive folitude forlorn; My spouse; my kingdom, and my birth to mourn.

In tears, and trembling, fpoke the filial queen. So lost in grief was lovely Venus of feen, terrible an army. The French translator, contrary to the original, ascribes this terror to the ghost of only one Prince, by which this stroke of Camoens, in the spirit of Shakespeare, is reduced to a piece of umneaning frippery.

By night our fathers' shades confess their fear, Their shrieks of terror from the tombs we hear. Camoens fays, "A mortos faz espanto," to give this elegance in English required a paraphrase. There is something wildly great, and agreeable to the supersition of that age, to suppose that the dead were troubled in their graves, on the approach of so

[.] See the first Æneid.

When Jove, her Sire, the beauteous mourner pray'd To grant her wandering fon the promifed aid. Great Jove was moved to hear the fair deplore, Gave all she ask'd, and grieved she ask'd no more. So grieved Alonzo's noble heart. And now The warrior binds in steel his awful brow; The glittering fquadrons march in proud array, On burnish'd shields the trembling sun-beams play: The blaze of arms the warlike rage inspires, And wakes from flothful peace the hero's fires. With trampling hoofs Evora's plains rebound, And sprightly neighings eccho far around; Far on each fide the clouds of dust arise, The drum's rough rattling rowls along the skies; The trumpet's shrilly clangor founds alarms, And each heart burns, and ardent pants for arms. Where their bright blaze the royal enfigns pour'd, High o'er the rest the great Alonzo tower'd; High o'er the rest was his bold front admired, And his keen eyes new warmth, new force inspired, Proudly he march'd, and now in Tarif's plain The two Alonzoes join their martial train: Right to the foe, in battle-rank updrawn, They pause—the mountain and the wide-spread lawn Afford not foot-room for the crowded foe: Awed with the horrors of the lifted blow

Pale look'd our bravest heroes. Swell'd with pride, The foes already conquer'd Spain divide, And lordly o'er the field the promised victors stride. So strode in Elah's vale the towering height Of Gath's proud champion; so with pale affright The Hebrews trembled, while with impious pride The large-limb'd foe the shepherd boy defy'd: The valiant boy advancing fits the string, And round his head he whirls the founding fling; The monster staggers with the forceful wound, And his huge bulk lies groaning on the ground. Such impious fcorn the Moor's proud bosom swell'd, When our thin fquadrons took the battle-field; Unconscious of the Power who led us on, That Power whose nod confounds th' infernal throne; Led by that Power, the brave Castilian bared The shining blade, and proud Morocco dared; His conquering brand the Lufian hero drew, And on Granada's fons reliftless flew; The lances rattle and the splinters sing, And the broad faulchions on the bucklers ring: With piercing shrieks the Moors their Prophet's name, And ours their guardian Saint aloud acclaim. Wounds gush on wounds, and blows resound to blows, A lake of blood the level plain o'erflows;

The wounded gasping in the purple tide,

Now find the death the sword but half supplied.

Though wove and quilted by their Ladies' hands,

Vain were the mail-plates of Granada's bands.

With such dread force the Lusian rush'd along,

Steep'd in red carnage lay the boastful throng.

Yet now disdainful of so light a prize,

Sheer o'er the field the thundering hero slies;

And his bold arm the brave Castilian joins

In dreadful consiict with the Moorish lines.

The parting Sun now pour'd the ruddy blaze,
And twinkling Vefper shot his silvery rays
Athwart the gloom, and closed the glorious day,
When low in dust the strength of Afric lay.
Such dreadful slaughter of the boastful Moor
Never on battle-field was heap'd before;
Not he whose childhood vow'd eternal hate
And desperate war against the Roman state:
Though three strong Coursers bent beneath the weight
Of rings of gold, by many a Roman Knight,

Though wove-It may perhaps be objected, that this is ungrammatical. But Quem penes arbitrium est, et jus et norma loquendi.

and Dryden, Pope, &c. often use were as a participle in place of the harsh sounding receiven, a word almost incompatible with the elégance of versification. The more harmonious word ought therefore to to be used; and use will ascertain its definition in grammar.

Erewhile,

Erewhile, the badge of rank distinguish'd, worn,'
From their cold hands at Cannæ's slaughter torn;
Not his dread sword bespread the reeking plain
With such wide streams of gore, and hills of slain;
Nor thine, O Titus, to the Stygian coast,
From blood-stain'd Salem sent so many a ghost;
Though ages ere she fell, the Prophets old
The dreadful scene of Salem's fall foretold,
In words that breathe wild horror: Nor the shore,
When carnage choak'd the stream, so smoak'd with gore,
When Marius' fainting legions drank the slood,
Yet warm and purpled with Ambronian slood;
Not such the heaps as now the plains of Tarif strew'd.

While glory thus Alonzo's name adorn'd,
To Lisbon's shores the happy Chief return'd,
In glorious peace and well-deserved repose,
His course of fame, and honoured age to close.
When now, O king, a Damsel's fate 'severe,
A fate which ever claims the woful tear,

q When the foldiers of Marius complained of thirst, he pointed to a river near the camp of the Ambrones; there, says he, you may drink, but it must be purchased with blood. Lead us on, they replied, that we may have something liquid, though it be blood. The Romans forcing their way to the river, the channel was filled with the dead bodies of the sain. Vid. Plut.

r This unfortunate lady, Donna Inez de Castro, was the daughter of a Castilian gentleman, who had taken refuge in the court of Portugal. Her beauty and accomplishments attracted the regard of Don Pedro, the king's eldest son, a prince of a brave and noble disposition. La Neufwille, Le Clede, and other historians, affert, that she was privately married to the prince ere she had any share in his bed. Nor was his conjugal sidelity less remarkable than the ardour of his passion. Afraid, however, of his father's refentment, the servity of whose temper he knew, his interceurse with Donna Inez passed at the court as an intrigue of gallantry. On the accession of Don Pedro the Cruel to the throne of Castile, many of the disgusted nobility were kindly received by Don Pedro, throthe interest of his beloved Inez. The savour shewn to these Castilians gave great uneasiness to the politicians. A thou-

Difgraced his honours—On the Nymph's lorn head Relentless rage its bitterest rancour shed: Yet fuch the zeal her princely lover bore, Her breathless corse the crown of Lisbon wore. 'Twas thou, O Love, whose dreaded shafts controul The hind's rude heart, and tear the hero's foul; Thou ruthless power, with bloodshed never cloyed, 'Twas thou thy lovely votary destroyed. Thy thirst still burning for a deeper woe, In vain to thee the tears of beauty flow; The breast that feels thy purest flames divine, With spouting gore must bathe thy cruel shrine. Such thy dire triumphs!-Thou, O Nymph, the while, Prophetic of the god's unpitying guile, In tender scenes by love-fick fancy wrought, By fear oft shifted as by fancy brought, In fweet Mondego's ever-verdant bowers, Languish'd away the slow and lonely hours: While now, as terror waked thy boding fears, The conscious stream received thy pearly tears; And now, as hope revived the brighter flame, Each eccho figh'd thy princely lover's name. Nor less could absence from thy prince remove The dear remembrance of his distant love:

fand evils were foreseen from the Prince's attachment to his Castilian mistress: even the murder of his children by his deceased spouse, the princess Constantia, was sarmised; and the enemies of Donna

Inez, finding the king willing to listen, omitted no opportunity to increase his refertment against the unfortunate lady. The prince was about his 28th year when his amour with his beloved Inez commenced.

Thy

Thy looks, thy fmiles, still meet his ravish'd eyes, And all thy beauteous charms before him rife: By night his flumbers bring thee to his arms, By day his thoughts still wander o'er thy charms: By night, by day, each thought thy loves employ, Each thought the memory or the hope of joy. Though fairest princely dames invok'd his love, No princely dame his constant faith could move: For thee alone his constant passion burn'd, For thee the proffer'd royal maids he fcorn'd. Ah, hope of bliss too high—the princely dames Refused, dread rage the father's breast inflames; He, with an old man's wintery eye, furveys The youth's fond love, and coldly with it weighs The peoples' murmurs of his fon's delay To bless the nation with his nuptial day. (Alas, the nuptial day was past unknown, Which but when crown'd the prince could dare to own.) And with the Fair One's blood the vengeful fire Resolves to quench his Pedro's faithful fire. Oh, thou dread fword, oft stain'd with heroes' gore, Thou awful terror of the prostrate Moor, What rage could aim thee at a female breaft, Unarm'd, by foftness and by love possest!

Dragg'd from her bower by murderous ruffian hands, Before the frowning king fair Inez stands; Her tears of artless innocence, her air So mild, fo lovely, and her face fo fair, Moved the stern Monarch; when with eager zeal Her fierce Destroyers urged the public weal; Dread rage again the Tyrant's foul possest, And his dark brow his cruel thoughts confest; O'er her fair face a sudden paleness spread, Her throbbing heart with generous anguish bled, Anguish to view her lover's hopeless woes, And all the mother in her bosom rose. Her beauteous eyes in trembling tear-drops drown'd, To heaven she lifted, for her hands were 'bound; Then on her infants turn'd the piteous glance, The look of bleeding woe; the babes advance, Smiling in innocence of infant age, Unawed, unconscious of their grandsire's rage; To whom, as bursting forrow gave the flow, The native heart-sprung eloquence of woe, The lovely captive thus: - O Monarch, hear, If e'er to thee the name of man was dear, If prowling tygers, or the the wolf's wild brood, Inspired by nature with the lust of blood, Have yet been moved the weeping babe to spare, Nor left, but tended with a nurse's care,

> Ad cœlum tendens ardentia lumina frustra, Lumina nam teneras arcebant vincula palmas.

As Rome's great founders to the world were given;
Shalt thou, who wear'st the sacred stamp of heaven,
The human form divine, shalt thou deny
That aid, that pity, which e'en beasts supply!
Oh, that thy heart were, as thy looks declare,
Of human mould, supersluous were my prayer;
Thou could'st not then a helpless damsel slay,
Whose sole offence in fond affection lay,
In faith to him who first his love confest,
Who first to love allured her virgin breast.
In these my babes shalt thou thine image see,
And still tremendous hurl thy rage on me?
Me, for their sakes, if yet thou wilt not spare,
Oh, let these infants prove thy pious care!

k It has been observed by some critics, that Milton on every occasion is fond of expressing his admiration of music, particularly of the song of the Nightingale, and the sull woodland choir. If in the same manner we are to judge of the favourite taste of Homer, we shall find it of a less delicate kind. He is continually describing the feast, the huge chine, the favoury viands on the glowing coals, and the foaming bowl. The ruling passion of Camoens is also strongly marked in his writings. One may venture to affirm, that there is no poem of equal length that abounds with so many impassioned encomiums on the fair fex as the Lusiad. The genius of Camoens seems never so pleased as when he is painting the variety of semale charms, he feels all the magic of their allurements, and riots in his descriptions of the happiness and miseries attendant on the passion of love. As he wrote from his feelings, these parts of his works have been particularly honoured with the attention of the world. Tasso and Spenser have copied from his Island. of Bliss, and three tragedies have been formed from this Episode of the unhappy Inez. One in English, by Mr. Mallet — but of this we need say nothing: it is one of the many neglected unsufferable loads of unanimated dulness, which, though honoured with the approbation of Mr. Garrick, have disgraced the English theatre, and rendered Modern Tragedy a name of contempt. The other two are by M. de la Motte, and Luis Velez de Guevara, a Spaniard. How these disferent writers have handled the same subject is not unworthy of the attention of the critic. The tragedy of M. de la Motte, from which Mallet's Elvira is copied, is highly characteristic of the French drama. In the Lussiad the beautiful victim expresses the strong emotions of genuine nature. She feels for what her lover will feel for her; the mother rises in her breast, she implores pity for her children; she feels the horrors of death,

Yet Pity's lenient current ever flows

From that brave breast where genuine valour glows;

That thou art brave, let vanquish'd Afric tell,

Then let thy pity o'er mine anguish swell;

Ah, let my woes, unconscious of a crime,

Procure mine exile to some barbarous clime:

and would be glad to wander an exile with her babes, where her only solace would be the remembrance of her faithful passion. This however, it appears, would not suit the taste of a Paris audience. On the French stage the stern Roman heroes must be polite Petit-Maitres, and the tender Inez a blustering amazon. Lee's Alexander cannot talk in a higher rant. She not only wishes to die herself, but desires that her children and her husband Don Pedro may also be put to death.

Hé bien, seigneur, suivez vos barbares maximes, On vous amene encor de nouvelles victimes. Immolez sans remords, et pour nous punir mieux, Ces gages d'un Hymen si coupable à vos vieux. Ils ignorent le fang, dont le ciel les a sit naitre, Par l'arrêt de leur mort faites les reconnaitre, Consonmez votre ouvrage, et que ses mêmes coups Rejoignent les ensans, et la femme, et l'epoux. 'The Spaniard however has followed nature and Camoens, and in point of poetical merit his play is insinitely superior to that of the Frenchman. Don Pedro talks in the absence of his mistress with the beautiful simplicity of an Arcadian lover, and Inez implores the tyrant with the genuine tenderness of semale affection and delicacy. The reader, who is acquainted with the Spanish tongue will thank me for the following extract.

Ines. A mis hijos me quitais?
Rey Don Alonfo, fenor,
Porque me quereis quitar
La vida de tantas vezes?
Advertid, fenor mirad,
Que el coraçon a pedaços
Dividido me arancais
Rey. Llevaldos, Alvar Gonçalez.

Ines. Hijos mios, donde vais?

Donde vais sin vuestra madre?
Falta en los hombres piedad?
Adonde vais luzes mais?
Como, que assi me dexais
En el mayor desconsuelo
En manos de la crueldad.

Nino Alson. Consuelate madre mia, Y a Dios te puedas quedar, Que vamos con nuestro abuelo, Y no querrá hazernas mal.

Ines. Possible es, senor, Rey mio, Padre, que ansi me cerreis La puerta para el perdon?

> Aora, fenor, aora, Aora es tiempo de monstrar El mucho poder que tiene Vuestra real Magestad.

Como, senor? vos os vais
Y a Alvar Gonçalez, y a Coello
Inhumanos me entregais?
Hijos, hijos de mi vida,
Dexad me los abraçar;
Alonso, mi vida hijo,
Dionis, a mores, tornad,
Tornad a ver vuestra madr
Pedro mio, donde estas
Que ansi te olvidas de mi?
Possible es que en tanto mal
Me falta tu vista, esposo?
Quien te pudiera avisar
Del peligro en que assigida
Dona Ines tu esposa esta.

The drama, from which these extracts are taken, is entitled, Reynar despues de morir.

Give me to wander o'er the burning plains Of Libya's defarts, or the wild domains Of Scythia's fnow-clad rocks and frozen shore, There let me, hopeless of return, deplore: Where ghastly horror fills the dreary vale, Where shrieks and howlings die on every gale, The lions roaring, and the tygers yell, There with mine infant race, confign'd to dwell, There let me try that piety to find, In vain by Me implored from human kind: There in some dreary cavern's rocky womb, Amid the horrors of sepulchral gloom, For him whose love I mourn, my love shall glow, The figh shall murmur, and the tear shall flow: All my fond wish, and all my hope, to rear These infant pledges of a love so dear, Amidst my griefs a foothing glad employ, Amidst my fears a woful, hopeless joy.

In tears she utter'd — as the frozen snow
Touch'd by the spring's mild ray, begins to slow,
So just began to melt his stubborn soul
As mild-ray'd Pity o'er the Tyrant stole;
But destiny forbade: with eager zeal,
Again pretended for the public weal,

Her fierce accusers urged her speedy doom;
Again dark rage diffused its horrid gloom
O'er stern Alonzo's brow: swift at the sign,
Their swords unsheathed around her brandish'd shine.
O foul disgrace, of knighthood lasting stain,
By men of arms an helpless lady 'slain!

Thus Pyrrhus, burning with unmanly ire,
Fulfill'd the mandate of his furious fire;
Disdainful of the frantic matron's prayer,
On fair Polyxena, her last fond care,
He rush'd, his blade yet warm with Priam's gore,
And dash'd the daughter on the facred floor;
While mildly she her raving mother eyed,
Resign'd her bosom to the sword, and died.
Thus Inez, while her eyes to heaven appeal,
Resigns her bosom to the murdering steel:

To give the character of Alphonso IV. will throw light on this inhuman transaction. He was an undutiful son, an unnatural brother, and a cruel father; a great and fortunate warrior, diligent in the execution of the laws, and a Machavilian politician. That good might be attained by villainous means, was his favourite maxim. When the enemies of Inez had persuaded him that her death was necessary to the westare of the state, he took a journey to Coimbra, that he might see the lady, when the prince his son was absent on a hunting party. Donna Inez with her children threw herself at his feet. The king was moved with the diftress of the beautiful suppliant, when his three counsellors, Alvaro Gonsalez, Diego Lopez Pacheco, and Pedro Coello, reproaching him for his disregard to the state, he relapsed to his former resolution. She was dragged from his presence, and brutally murdered by the hands of his three counsellors, who immediately returned to the king with their daggers recking with the innocent blood of the princess his daughter-inlaw. Alonzo, says La Neufville, avowed the horrid assassing as if he had done nothing for which he ought to be assamed.

That snowy neck, whose matchless form sustain'd The loveliest face where all the Graces reign'd, Whose charms so long the gallant Prince inflamed, That her pale corse was Lisbon's queen proclamed, That fnowy neck was stain'd with spouting gore, Another fword her lovely bosom tore. The flowers that gliften'd with her tears bedew'd, Now shrunk and languish'd with her blood imbrew'd. As when a rose, ere while of bloom so gay, Thrown from the careless virgin's breast away. Lies faded on the plain, the living red, The fnowy white, and all its fragrance fled; So from her cheeks the roses dy'd away, And pale in death the beauteous Inez lay: With dreadful smiles, and crimson'd with her blood, Round the wan victim the stern murderers stood, Unmindful of the fure, though future hour, Sacred to vengeance and her Lover's power.

O Sun, couldst thou so foul a crime behold,
Nor veil thine head in darkness, as of old
A sudden night unwonted horror cast
O'er that dire banquet, where the sire's repast
The son's torn limbs supplied!—Yet you, ye vales!
Ye distant forests, and ye flowery dales!

When pale and finking to the dreadful fall, You heard her quivering lips on Pedro call; Your faithful echoes caught the parting found, And Pedro! Pedro! mournful, figh'd around. Nor less the wood-nymphs of Mondego's groves Bewail'd the memory of her haples loves: Her griefs they wept, and to a plaintive rill Transform'd their tears, which weeps and murmurs still. To give immortal pity to her woe They taught the riv'let through her bowers to flow, And still through violet beds the fountain pours Its " plaintive wailing, and is named Amours. Nor long her blood for vengeance cry'd in vain: Her gallant Lord begins his awful reign, In vain her murderers for refuge fly, Spain's wildest hills no place of rest supply. The injur'd Lover's and the Monarch's ire, And stern-brow'd Justice in their doom conspire: In hissing flames they die, and yield their souls in * fire.

* At an old royal castle near Mondego, there is a rivulet called the fountain of Amours. According to tradition, it was here that Don Pedro resided with his beloved. Inez. The siction of Camoens, founded on the popular name of the rivulet, is in the spirit of Homer.

* When the Prince was informed of the death of his beloved Incz, he was transported into the most violent fury. He took arms against his father. The country between the rivers Minho and Doura was laid applicate: but by the interposition of the Queen and the Archbishop of Braga the Prince relented, and the further horrors of a civil war were prevented. Don Alonzo was not only reconciled to his son, but laboured by every means to oblige him, and to esface from his memory the injury and insult he had received. The Prince, however, still continued to discover the strongest marks of affection and grief. When he succeeded to the crown, one of his sirst acts was a treaty with the King of Castile, whereby, each Monarch engaged to give up such malecontents, as should take refuge in each other's

Nor this alone his stedfast soul display'd:
Wide o'er the land he waved the awful blade
Of red-arm'd Justice. From the shades of night
He dragg'd the soul adulterer to light:
The robber from his dark retreat was led,
And he, who spilt the blood of murder, bled.

other's dominions. In consequence of this. Pedro Coello and Alvaro Gonsalez, who, on the death of Alonzo, had fled to Castile, were fent prisoners to Don Pedro. Diego Pecheco, the third murderer, made his efcape. The other two were put to death with the most exquisite tortures, and most justly merited, if exquisite torture is in any instance to be allowed. After this the King, Don Pedro, summoned an assembly of the states at Cantanedes. Here, in the presence of the Pope's nuncio, he folemnly swore on the holy Gospels, that having obtained a dispensation from Rome, he had secretly, at Braganza, espoused the Lady Inez de Castro, in the presence of the Bishop of Guarda, and of his master of the wardrobe; both of whom confirmed the truth of the oath. The Pope's Bull, containing the dispensation, was published; the body of Inez was lifted from the grave, was placed on a magnificent throne, and with the proper Regalia, crowned Queen of Portugal. The nobility did homage to her skeleton, and kissed the bones of her hand. The corps was then intered at the royal monastery of Alcobaça, with a pomp before unknown in Portugal, and with all the honours due to a Queen. Her monument is still extant, where her statue is adorned with the diadem and the royal robe. This, with the legitimation of her children, and the care he took of all who had been in her fervice, confoled him in some degree, and rendered him more conversable than he had hitherto been; but the cloud which the death of his Inez brought over the natural cheerfulness of his temper, was never totally difperfed. --- A circumstance strongly characteristic of the rage of his resentment must not be omitted. When the murderers were brought before him, he was so transported with indignation, that he struck Pedro Coello several blows on the face with the shaft of his whip. Some grave writers have branded this action as unworthy of the Magistrate and the Hero; those who will, may add, of the Philosophet too: Something greater however belongs to Don Pedro: A regard which we do not feel for any of the three, will, in every bosom, capable of genuine love, inspire a tender sympathy for the agonies of his heart, when the presence of the inhuman murderers presented to his mind the horrid scene of the butchery of his beloved spouse.

LUSIAD.

The impression left on the philosophical mind by these historical facts, will naturally suggest some resections on human nature. Every man is proud of being thought capable of love; and none more so than those who have the least title to the name of Lover; those whom the French call Les bemmes de Galanterie, whose only happiness is in variety, and to whom the greatest beauty and mental accomplishments lose every charm after a sew months enjoyment. Their satiety they scruple not to confess, but are not aware, that in doing fo, they also confess, that the principle which inspired their passion was gross, and selfish. To constitute a genuine Love, like that of Don Pedro, requires a nobleness and goodness of heart, totally incompatible with an ungenerous mind. The youthful fever of the veins may, for a while, inspire an attachment to a particular object; but an affection so unchangeable and fincere as that of the Prince of Portugal, can only spring from a bosom possessed of the finest feelings and of every virtue.

Unmoved he heard the proudest Noble plead,
Where Justice aim'd her sword, with stubborn speed Fell the dire stroke. Nor cruelty inspired,
Noblest humanity his bosom fired.
The Caitiff, starting at his thoughts, represt
The seeds of murder springing in his breast.
His outstretch'd arm the lurking thief withheld,
For fixt as fate he knew his doom was feal'd.
Safe in his Monarch's care the Ploughman toil'd,
And force and violence was far exiled.
Pedro ' the just the peopled towns proclaim,
And every field resounds her Monarch's name.

r Pedro the just—History cannot afford an instance of any Prince who has a more eminent claim to the title of just than Pedro I. His diligence to correct every abuse was indefatigable, and when guilt was proved his justice was inexorable. He was dreadful to the evil, and beloved by the good, for he respected no persons, and his instexible severity never digressed from the line of strict justice. An anecdote or two will throw some light on his character. A Priest having killed a Mason, the king dissembled his knowledge of the crime, and left the issue to the Ecclesiastical Court, where the Priest was punished by one year's suspension from saying mass. The king on this privately ordered the Mason's son to revenge the murder of his father. The young man obeyed, was apprehended, and condemned to death. When his sentence was to be consisted by the king, Pedro enquired, what was the young man's trade. He was answered, that he followed his sather's. We'll then, said the king, I shall commute his punishment, and interdict him from meddling with stone or mortar for a twelvemonth. After this he fully established the authority of the king's courts over the Clergy, whom he punished with death when their crimes were capital. When solicited to refer the causes of such criminals to a higher tribunal, he would anfwer very calmly, That is what I intend to do: I will fend them to the highest of all tribunals, to that of their Maker and mine. Against Adulterers he was parti-cularly severe, often declaring it his opinion, that conjugal infidelity was the fource of the greatest evils, and that therefore to restrain it was the interest and duty of the Sovereign. Though the fate of his beloved Inez chagrined and foured his temper, he was fo far from being naturally fullen or passionate, that he was rather of a gay and sprightly disposition, affable and easy of access; delighted in music and dancing; a lover of learning, was himself a man of letters, and an elegant Poet. Vide I.e Clede, Mariana, Faria.

Of this brave Prince the foft degenerate fon, Fernando the remiss, ascends the throne. With arm unnerved the liftless soldier lay And own'd the influence of a nerveless sway: The stern Castilian drew the vengeful brand, And strode proud victor o'er the trembling land. How terrible the hour, when heaven, in rage, Thunders its vengeance on a guilty age! Unmanly floth the King, the nation stain'd; And lewdness foster'd by the Monarch reign'd: The Monarch own'd that first of crimes unjust, The wanton revels of adulterous lust: Such was his rage for beauteous 2 Leonore, Her from her husband's widow'd arms he tore: Then with unbleft, unhallow'd nuptials stain'd The facred altar, and its rites profaned. Alas! the splendor of a crown, how vain, From heaven's dread eye to veil the dimmest stain!

the province between the Douro and Minho. Henry king of Castile, being informed of the general discontent that reigned in Portugal, marched a formidable army into that kingdom, to revenge the injury offered to fome of his subjects, whose ships had been unjustly seized at Lisbon. The desolation hinted at by Camoens ensued. After the subjects of both kingdoms had severely suffered, the two kings ended the war, much to their mutual satisfaction, by an intermarriage of their bastard children.

² This lady, named Leonera de Tellez, was the wife of Don Juan Lerenzo Acugna, a nobleman of one of the most distinguished families in Portugal. After a sham process this marriage was dissolved, and the king privately espoused to her, though at this time he was publicly married by proxy to Donna Leonora of Arragon. A dangerous insurrection, headed by one Velasquez, a taylor, drove the king and his adulterous bride from Lisbon. Soon after he caused his marriage to be publickly celebrated in

To conquering Greece, to ruin'd Troy, what woes, What ills on ills, from Helen's rape arose!

Let Appius own, let banish'd Tarquin tell

On their hot rage what heavy vengeance fell.

One female ravish'd Gibeah's streets beheld,

O'er Gibeah's streets the blood of thousands swell'd

In vengeance of the crime; and streams of blood

The guilt of Zion's sacred bard pursued.

Yet Love full oft with wild delirium blinds,
And fans his basest fires in noblest minds;
The semale garb the great Alcides wore,
And for his Omphale the distast 'bore.
For Cleopatra's smiles the world was lost:
The Roman terror, and the Punic boast,
Cannæ's great victor, for a harlot's smile,
Resign'd the harvest of his glorious toil.
And who can boast he never felt the fires,
The trembling throbbings of the young desires,
When he beheld the breathing roses glow,
And the soft heavings of the living snow;
The waving ringlets of the auburn hair,
And all the rapturous graces of the Fair!

² Judges, chap. xix. and xx. ³ 2 Samuel, chap. iii. 10. "The fword shall never depart from thine house."

Alcidem lanas nere coëgit amor. OVID.

Oh! what defence, if fixt on him, he fpy
The languid sweetness of the stedfast eye!
Ye who have felt the dear luxurious smart,
When angel charms oppress the powerless heart,
In pity here relent the brow severe,
And o'er Fernando's weakness drop the tear.

To conclude the notes on this book, it may not be unnecessary to observe, that Camoens, in this Episode, has happily adhered to a principal rule of the Epopea. To paint the manners and characters of the age in which the action is placed, is as requisite in the Epic Poem, as it is to preserve the unity of the character of an Individual. That gallantry of bravery and romantic cast of the military adventures, which characterised the Spaniards and Portuguese during the Moorish wars, is happily supported by Camoens in its most just and striking colours. In history we find surprising victories obtained over the Infidels: In the Lusiad we find the heroes breathing that enthusiasm which led them to conquest, that enthusiasm of military honours so strongly expressed by Alonzo V. of Portugal, at the feige of Arzila. In storming the citadel, the Count de Marialva, a brave old officer, lost his life. The King leading his only son, the Prince Don Juan, to the body of the Count, while the blood yet streamed from his wounds; "Behold, he cried, that great man! May God grant you, my son, to imitate his virtues. May your honour, like his, be complete!"

LUSIAD.

BOOK IV.

When dark the night, and loud the tempest howls,
When the lorn mariner in every wave
That breaks and gleams, forbodes his watery grave;
But when the dawn, all silent and serene,
With soft-paced ray dispels the shades obscene,
With grateful transport sparkling in each eye,
The joyful crew the port of safety spy;
Such darkling tempests and portended fate,
While weak Fernando lived, appall'd the state;
Such when he dy'd, the peaceful morning rose,
The dawn of joy, and sooth'd the public woes.

U

As blazing glorious o'er the shades of night,
Bright in his east breaks forth the Lord of light,
So valiant John with dazzling blaze appears,
And from the dust his drooping nation rears.
Though sprung from youthful Passion's wanton loves,
Great Pedro's son in noble soul he proves;
And heaven announced him king by right divine,
A cradled infant gave the wondrous sign.
Her tongue had never lisp'd the mother's name,
No word, no mimic sound her lips could frame,
When heaven the miracle of speech inspired;
She raised her little hands, with rapture fired,
Let Portugal, she cried, with joy proclaim
The brave Don John, and own her monarch's name.

The burning fever of domestic rage

Now wildly raved, and mark'd the barbarous age;

a A cradled infant gave the avondrous fign—No circumstance has ever been more ridiculed by the ancient and modern pedants than Alexander's pretensions to divinity. Some of his courtiers expostulating with him one day on the absurdity of such claim, he replied, "I know the truth of what you say, but these," (pointing to a croud of Persians) "these know no better." The report that the Grecian army was commanded by a son of Jupiter spread terror through the East, and greatly facilitated the operations of the Conqueror. The miraculous speech of the infant, attested by a sew monks, was awapted to the superstition of the age of John I. and as he was a bastard, was of infinite service to his cause. The pretended fast however is differently related. By some thus: When Don John, then regent of Portugal, was going to Coimbra, to assist at an affembly of the states, at a little distance from the city he was met by a great number of children riding upon sticks, who no sooner saw him than they cried out, "Blessed be Don John king of "Portugal; the king is coming, Don "John shall be king." Whether this was owing to art or accident, it had a great effect. At the assembly the regent was elected king.

Through

Through every rank the headlong fury ran, And first red slaughter in the court began. Of spousal vows and widow'd bed defiled, Loud fame the beauteous Leanore reviled. The adulterous noble in her presence bled, And torn with wounds his numerous friends lay dead. No more those ghastly deathful nights amaze, When Rome wept tears of blood in Scylla's days; More horrid deeds Ulysses' towers beheld: Each cruel breast where rankling envy swell'd, Accused his foe as minion of the queen; Accused, and murder closed the dreary scene. All holy ties the frantic transport braved, Nor facred priesthood nor the altar faved. Thrown from a tower, like Hector's fon of yore, The mitred bhead was dash'd with brains and gore. Ghaftly with scenes of death, and mangled limbs, And black with clotted blood each pavement fwims.

With all the fierceness of the female ire, When rage and grief to tear the breast conspire, him, as of the queen's party. He was thrown from the tower of his own cathedral, whither he had fled to avoid the popular fury.

U 2

b The mitted head.—Don Martin, bishop of Lisbon, a man of an exemplary life. He was by birth a Castilian, which was esteemed a sufficient reason to murder

The queen beheld her power, her honours ' loft.

And ever when she slept th' adulterer's ghost,

All pale, and pointing at his bloody shroud,

Seem'd ever for revenge to scream aloud.

Casteel's proud monarch to the nuptial bed In happier days her royal daughter led. To him the furious queen for vengeance cries, Implores to vindicate his lawful prize,

· The queen beheld her power, her honours lost-Possessed of great beauty and great abilities, this bad woman was a difgrace to her sex, and a curse to the age and country which gave her birth. Her sister, Donna Maria, a lady of unblemished virtue, had been secretly married to the infant Dore Juan, the king's brother, who was passion-ately attached to her. Donna Maria had formerly endeavoured to dissuade her sister from the adulterous marriage with the king. In revenge of this, the queen Leonora persuaded Don Juan that her sister was unfaithful to his bed. The enraged husband hasted to his wife, and without enquiry or exposulation, says Mariana, dispatched her with two strokes of his dagger. He was afterwards convinced of her innocence. Having facrificed her honour and her first husband to a king, fays Faria, Leonora foon facrificed that king to a wicked gallant, a Castilian nobleman, named Don Juan Fernandez de Andeyro. An unjust war with Castile, wherein the the Portuguese were deseated by sea and land, was the first fruits of the policy of the new favourite. Andeyro one day being in a great fweat by some military exercise, the queen tore her veil, and publicly gave it him to wipe his face. The grand master of Avis, the king's bastard brother, afterwards John I. and fome others, expostulated with her on the indecency of this behaviour. She dissembled her refentment, Unit foon after they were feized and committed to the castle of Evera, where a forged order for their execution was fent; but the governor suspecting some fraud, shewed it to the king. Yet such was her ascendency over Fernando, that though convinced of her guilt, he ordered his brother to kiss the queen's hand, and thank her for his life. Soon after Fernando died, but not till he was fully convinced of the queen's conjugal infidelity, and had given an order for the affaffination of the gallant. Not long after the death of the king, the favourite Andeyro was stabbed in the palace by the grand master of Avis, and Don Ruy de Peregra. The queen expressed all the tran-fport of grief and rage, and declared she would undergo the trial ordeal in vindication of his and her innocence. But this the never performed: in her vows of revenge, however, she was more punctual. Don Juan king of Castile, who had married her only daughter and heiress, at her earnest entreaties invaded Portugal, and was proclaimed king. Don John, grand master of Avis, was proclaimed by the people protector and regent. A desperate war ensued. Queen Leonora, treated with indisference by her daughter and fon-in-law, refolved on the murder of the latter, but the plot was discovered, and she was sent prisoner to Cashile. The regent was be-sleged in Lisbon, and the city reduced to the utmost extremities, when an epidemical distemper broke out in the Castilian army, and made such devastation that the king sudThe Lusian sceptre, his by spousal right;

The proud Castilian arms and dares the fight.
To join his standard as it waves along,
The warlike troops from various regions throng:
Those who possess the lands by Rodrick given,
What time the Moor from Turia's banks was driven;
That race who joyful smile at war's alarms,
And scorn each danger that attends on arms;

denly raised the siege, and abandoned his views in Portugal. The happy inhabitants afcribed their deliverance to the valour and vigilance of the regent. The regent reproved their ardour, exhorted them to repair to their churches, and return thanks to God, to whose interposition he solely afcribed their fafety. This behaviour increased the admiration of the people, the nobility of the first rank joined the regent's party, and many garrisons in the interest of the king of Castile opened their gates to him. An assembly of the states met at Coimbra, where it was proposed to invest the regent with the regal dignity. This he pretended to decline. Don John, fon of Pedro the Just, and the beautiful Inez de Castro, was by the people esteemed their lawful fovereign, but was, and had been long detained a prisoner by the king of Castile. If the states would declare the infant Don John their king, the regent professed his willingness to swear allegiance to him, that he would continue to expose himself to every danger, and act as regent, till providence iestored to Portugal her lawful fovereign. The states however faw the necessity that the nation should have an head. The regent was unanimously elected king, and some articles in favour of liberty were added to those agreed upon at the coronation of Don Alonzo Enriquez, the first king of Portugal.

Don John I. one of the greatest of the Portuguese monarchs, was the natural son of Pedro the Just, by Donna Terefa Lorenza, a Galician lady, and born some years after the death of Inez. At seven years of age he was made grand master of Avis, where he received an excellent education, which joined to his great parts, produced him early on the political theatre. He was a brave commander, and a deep politician, yet never sorfeited the character of candour and honour. To be humble to his friends, and haughty to his enemies, was his leading maxim. His prudence gained him the confidence of the wise, his steadiness and gratitude the friendship of the brave; his liberality the bulk of the people. He was in the twenty-seventh year of his age when declared protector, and in the twenty-eighth when oroclaimed king.

when proclaimed king.

The following anecdote is much to the honour of this prince when regent. A Caftilian officer having fix Portuguese gentlemen prisoners, cut off their noses and hands, and sent them to Don John. Highly incensed, the protector commanded fix Castilian gentlemen to be treated in the same manner. But before the officer, to whom he gave the orders, had quitted the room, he resented. "I have given enough to "resentent, said he, in giving such a "command. It were infamous to put it in execution. See that the Cassilian pri-

"foners receive no harm."

d — by Rodrick given — The celebrated hero of Corneille's tragedy of the Cid.

Whofe

Whose crooked ploughshares Leon's uplands tear, Now cased in steel in glittering arms appear, Those arms erewhile so dreadful to the Moor: The Vandals glorying in their might of yore March on; their helms and moving lances gleam Along the flowery vales of Betis' stream: Nor staid the Tyrian islanders behind, On whose proud ensigns floating on the 'wind Alcides' pillars tower'd: Nor wonted fear Withheld the base Galician's fordid spear; Though still his crimson seamy scars reveal The fure-aim'd vengeance of the Lufian steel. Where tumbling down Cuenca's mountain fide The murmuring Tagus rolls his foamy tide, Along Toledo's lawns, the pride of Spain, Toledo's warriors join the martial train: Nor less the furious lust of war inspires The Biscayneer, and wakes his barbarous fires, Which ever burn for vengeance, if the tongue Of hapless stranger give the fancy'd wrong. Nor bold Asturia, nor Guispuscoa's shore, Famed for their steely wealth, and iron ore, Delay'd their vaunting squadrons; o'er the dales Cased in their native steel, and belted mails, d Cadiz; of old a Phænician colony.

Blue gleaming from afar they march along, And join with many a spear the warlike throng. And thus, wide sweeping o'er the trembling coast, The proud Castilian leads his numerous host; The valiant John for brave defence prepares, And in himself collected greatly dares: For fuch high valour in his bosom glow'd, As Samfon's locks by miracle bestow'd: Safe in himself resolved the hero stands, Yet calls the leaders of his anxious bands: The council fummon'd, fome with prudent mien, And words of grave advice their terrors fcreen. By floth debased, no more the ancient fire Of patriot loyalty can now inspire; And each pale lip feem'd opening to declare For tame fubmission, and to shun the war; When glorious Nunio, starting from his feat, Claim'd every eye, and closed the cold debate: Singling his brothers from the dastard train, His rowling looks, that flash'd with stern disdain, On them he fixt, then fnatch'd his hilt in ire, While his bold speech bewray'd the foldier's fire, Bold and unpolish'd; while his burning eyes Seem'd as he dared the ocean, earth, and skies.

⁵ This speech in the original has been much admired by the foreign critics, as a model of military eloquence. The critic, it is hoped, will perceive that the Translator has endeavoured to support the character of the Speaker.

Heavens! shall the Lusian nobles tamely yield! Oh shame! and yield untry'd the martial field! That land whose genius, as the God of war, Was own'd, where'er approach'd her thundering car; Shall now her fons their faith, their love deny, And, while their country finks, ignobly fly! Ye timorous herd, are you the genuine line Of those illustrious shades, whose rage divine, Beneath great Henry's standards awed the foe, For whom you tremble and would ftoop fo low! That foe, who, boaftful now, then basely fled, When your undaunted fires the hero led, When feven bold Earls in chains the spoil adorn'd, And proud Casteel through all her kindreds mourn'd, Casteel, your awful dread - yet, conscious, say, When Diniz reign'd, when his bold fon bore fway, By whom were trodden down the bravest bands That ever march'd from proud Castilia's lands? 'Twas your brave fires—and has one languid reign Fix'd in your tainted fouls fo deep a stain, That now degenerate from your noble fires, The last dim spark of Lusian stame expires? Though weak Fernando reign'd in war unskill'd, A godlike king now calls you to the field. Oh! could like his your mounting valour glow, Vain were the threatnings of the vaunting foe.

Not proud Casteel, oft by your sires o'erthrown,
But every land your dauntless rage should own.
Still if your hands benumb'd by female fear,
Shun the bold war, hark! on my sword I swear,
Myself alone the dreadful war shall wage,
Mine be the fight—and trembling with the rage
Of valorous sire, his hand half-drawn display'd
The awful terror of his shining blade—
I and my vassals dare the dreadful shock;
My shoulders never to a foreign yoke
Shall bend; and by my Sovereign's wrath I vow,
And by that loyal faith renounced by you,
My native land unconquer'd shall remain,
And all my Monarch's foes shall heap the plain.

The hero paused—'Twas thus the youth of Rome,
The trembling few who 'scaped the bloody doom
That dy'd with slaughter Cannæ's purple field,
Assembled stood, and bow'd their necks to yield;
When nobly rising with a like disdain
The young Cornelius raged, nor raged in by vain:

and drawing his fword, faid, I fwear that I will not dejert the Commonwealth of Rome, nor fuffer any other citizen to do it. The fame oath I require of you, Cacilius, and of all prefent; wheever refuses, let him know that this sword is drawn against him. The Historian adds, that they were as terrified by this, as if they had beheld the face of their conqueror Hannibal. They all swore, and submitted themselves to Scipio. Vid. Liv. B. 22. C. 53.

h This was the famous P. Corn. Scipio Africanus. The fact, fomewhat differently related by Livy, is this. After the defeat at Cannæ, a confiderable body of Romans fled to Canufium, and appointed Scipio and Ap. Claudius their commanders. While they remained there, it was told Scipio, that fome of his chief officers, at the head of whom was Cæcilius Metellus, were taking measures to transport themselves out of Italy. He went immediately to their affembly;

On his dread fword his daunted peers he fwore, (The reeking blade yet black with Punic gore) While life remain'd their arms for Rome to wield, And but with life their conquer'd arms to yield. Such martial rage brave Nunio's mien inspired; Fear was no more: with rapturous ardour fired, To horse, to horse, the gallant Lusians cry'd; Rattled the belted mails on every side, The spear-staffs trembled; round their heads they waved Their shining faulchions, and in transport raved, The King our guardian - loud their shouts rebound, And the fierce commons ecchoe back the found. The mails that long in rusting peace had hung, Now on the hammer'd anvils hoarfely rung: Some foft with wool the plumy helmets line, And some the breast-plate's scaly belts entwine: The gaudy mantles some, and scarfs prepare, Where various lightfome colours gaily flare; And golden tiffue, with the warp enwove, Displays the emblems of their youthful love.

The valiant John, begirt with warlike state, Now leads his bands from fair Abrantes' gate; Whose lawns of green the infant Tagus laves, As from his spring he rolls his cooly waves. The daring van in Nunio's care could boast
A general worthy of th' unnumber'd host,
Whose gaudy banners trembling Greece defy'd,
When boastful Xerxes lash'd the Sestian tide:
Nunio, to proud Casteel as dread a name,
As erst to Gaul and Italy the same
Of Attila's impending rage. The right
Brave Roderic led, a Chieftain train'd in sight:
Before the lest the bold Almada rode,
And proudly waving o'er the center nod
The royal ensigns, glittering from afar,
Where godlike John inspires and leads the war.

'Twas now the time, when from the stubbly plain
The labouring hinds had borne the yellow grain;
The purple vintage heapt the foamy tun,
And sierce and red the sun of August shone;
When from the gate the squadrons march along:
Crowds prest on crowds, the walls and ramparts throng:
Here the sad mother rends her hoary hair,
While hope's fond whispers struggle with despair:
The weeping spouse to heaven extends her hands:
And cold with dread the modest virgin stands,
Her earnest eyes, suffused with trembling dew,
Far o'er the plain the plighted youth pursue:

And prayers and tears and all the female wail, And holy vows the throne of heaven assail.

Now each stern host full front to front appears, And one joint shout heaven's airy concave tears: A dreadful pause ensues, while conscious pride Strives on each face the heart-felt doubt to hide. Now wild and paie the boldest face is feen; With mouth half open and disordered mien Each warrior feels his creeping blood to freeze, And languid weakness trembles in the knees. And now the clangor of the trumpet founds, And the rough rattling of the drum rebounds: The fife's shrill whistling cuts the gale, on high The flourish'd ensigns shine with many a dye Of blazing splendor: o'er the ground they wheel And chuse their footing, when the proud Casteel Bids found the horrid charge; loud bursts the found, And loud Artabro's rocky cliffs rebound: The thundering roar rolls round on every fide, And trembling finks Guidana's rapid tide; The flow-paced Durius rushes o'er the plain, And fearful Tagus hastens to the main: Such was the tempest of the dread alarms, The babes that prattled in their nurses' arms

Shriek'd

Shriek'd at the found; with fudden cold imprest, The mothers strain'd their infants to the breast, And shook with horror - now, far round, begin The bow strings whizzing, and the brazen k din Of arms on armour rattling; either van Are mingled now, and man opposed to man: To guard his native fields the one inspires, And one the raging lust of conquest fires: Now with fixt teeth, their writhing lips of blue, Their eye-balls glaring of the purple hue, Each arm strains swiftest to impell the blow; Nor wounds they value now, nor fear they know, Their only passion to offend the foe. In might and fury, like the warrior God, Before his troops the glorious Nunio rode: That land, the proud invaders claim'd, he fows With their spilt blood, and with their corses strews; Their forceful volleys now the cross bows pour, The clouds are darken'd with the arrowy shower; The white foam reeking o'er their wavy mane, The fnorting courfers rage and paw the plain;

The circumstances preparatory to the engagement are happily imagined, and solemnly conducted, and the fury of the combat is supported with a poetical heat, and a variety of imagery, which, one need not hesitate to affirm, would do honeur to an ancient classic.

^{*} Homer and Virgil have, with great art, gradually heightened the fury of every battle, till the last efforts of their genius were lavished in describing the superior prowess of the Hero in the decisive engagement. Camoens, in like manner, has bestowed his utmost attention on this his principal battle.

Beat by their iron hoofs, the plain rebounds,
As distant thunder through the mountains sounds:
The ponderous spears crash, splintering far around;
The horse and horsemen flounder on the ground;
The ground groans with the sudden weight opprest,
And many a buckler rings on many a crest.
Where wide around the raging Nunio's sword
With surious sway the bravest squadrons gored,
The raging foes in closer ranks advance,
And his own brothers shake the hostile 'lance.
Oh! horrid sight! yet not the ties of blood,
Nor yearning memory his rage withstood;

And his own brothers shake the bossile lance—The just indignation with which Camoens treats the kindred of the brave Nunio Alvaro de Pereyra, is condemned by the French Translator. "Dans le sond, says he, les Pereyras ne meritoient aucune stetrissure, &c.—The Pereyras deserve no stain on their memory for joining the king of Castile, whose title to the crown of Portugal was infinitely more just and solid than that of Don John." Castera, however, is grossly mistaken. Don Alonzo Enriquez, the first king of Portugal, was elected by the people, who had recovered their liberties at the glorious battle of Ourique. At the election the constitution of the kingdom was settled in eighteen short statutes, wherein it is expressly provided, that none but a Portuguese can be king of Portugal; that if an Infanta marry a foreign Prince, he shall not, in her right, become king of Portugal, and a new election of a king, in case of the sailure of the male line, is by these statutes supposed legal. By the treaty of marriage between the king of Castile and Donna Beatrix, the heires of Fernando of Portugal, it was agreed, that only their children should succeed to the Portuguese crown; and that, in case the throne became vacant ere such children were born, the queendowager Leonora should govern with the title of Regent. Thus, neither by the original constitution, nor the treaty of marriage, could the king of Castile succeed to the throne of Portugal. And any pretence he might found on the marriage contract was already forseited; for he caused himself and his queen to be proclaimed, added Portugal to his titles, coined Portuguese money with his bust, deposed the queen Regent, and afterwards sent her prisoner to Castile. The lawful heir, Don Juan, the son of Inez de Castro, was kept in prison by his rival the king of Castile; and as before observed, a new election was, by the original statutes, supposed legal in cases of emergency. These facts, added to the consideration of the tyranny of the king of Castile, and the great services Don John had rendered his country, upon whom its existence, as a kingdom, depended, fully vindicate the indignation of Camoens against the traiterous Percyras.

With proud disdain his honest eyes behold
Who e'er the traytor, who his king has sold.
Nor want there others in the hostile band
Who draw their swords against their native land;
And headlong driven, by impious rage accurst,
In rank were foremost, and in sight the first.
So sons and fathers, by each other slain,
With horrid slaughter dyed Pharsalia's plain.
Ye dreary ghosts, who now for treasons foul,
Amidst the gloom of Stygian darkness howl;
Thou Cataline, and, stern Sertorius, tell
Your brother shades, and soothe the pains of hell;
With triumph tell them, some of Lusian race
Like you have earn'd the Traytor's foul disgrace.

As waves on waves, the foes encreasing weight
Bears down our foremost ranks and shakes the fight;
Yet firm and undismay'd great Nunio stands,
And braves the tumult of surrounding bands.
So, from high Ceuta's rocky mountains stray'd,
The ranging Lion braves the shepherd's shade;
The shepherds hastening o'er the Tetuan plain,
With shouts surround him, and with spears restrain:
He stops, with grinning teeth his breath he draws,
Nor is it fear, but rage, that makes him pause;

His threatening eyeballs burn with sparkling fire,
And his stern heart forbids him to retire:
Amidst the thickness of the spears he slings,
So midst his foes the furious Nunio springs:
The Lusian grass with foreign gore distain'd,
Displays the carnage of the hero's hand.

- " An ample shield the brave Giraldo bore,
- " Which from the vanquish'd Perez' arm he tore;
- " Pierced through that shield, cold death invades his eye,
- " And dying Perez faw his Victor die.
- " Edward and Pedro emulous of fame,
- " The same their friendship, and their youth the same,
- " Through the fierce Brigians hew'd their bloody " way,
- ". Till in a cold embrace the striplings lay.
- " Lopez and Vincent rush'd on glorious death,
- " And midst their slaughtered foes resign'd their breath.
- " Alonzo glorying in his youthful might
- " Spur'd his fierce courfer through the staggering fight:
- " Shower'd from the dashing hoofs the spatter'd gore
- " Flies round; but soon the Rider vaunts no more:
- " Five Spanish swords the murmuring ghosts atone,
- " Of five Castilians by his arm o'erthrown.

Through t'e fierce Brigians—The Castilians, so called from one of their ancient kings, named Brix, or Brigus, whom the Monkish fabulists call the grandson of Noah.

Transfix'd

- "Transfixt with three Iberian spears, the gay,
- " The knightly lover young Hilario lay:
- Though, like a rose, cut off in opening bloom,
- " The Hero weeps not for his early doom;
- " Yet trembling in his fwimming eye appears
- "The pearly drop, while his pale cheek he rears,
- " To call his loved Antonia's name he tries,
- "The name half utter'd, down he finks, and "dies."

Now through his shatter'd ranks the Monarch strode,
And now before his rally'd squadrons rode:
Brave Nunio's danger from afar he spies,
And instant to his aid impetuous slies.
So when returning from the plunder'd folds,
The Lioness her emptied den beholds,
Enraged she stands, and listening to the gale,
She hears her whelps low howling in the vale;
The living sparkles slashing from her eyes,
To the Massylian shepherd-tents she slies;
She groans, she roars, and ecchoing far around
The seven twin-mountains tremble at the sound:

n These lines marked in the text with turned commas, are not in the common editions of Camoens. They consist of three stanzas in the Portuguese, and are said to have been lest out by the author himself in his second edition. The translator, however, as they breathe the true spirit of Virgil, was willing to preserve them with this acknowledgement; in this he he has followed the example of Castera.

o Massylia, a province in Numidia, greatly infested with lions, particularly that part of it called Os fete montes irmaos, the seven brother mountains.

So raged the king, and with a chosen train

He pours resistless o'er the heaps of slain.

Oh bold companions of my toils, he cries,

Our dear-loved freedom on our lances lies;

Behold your friend, your Monarch leads the way,

And dares the thickest of the iron fray.

Say, shall the Lusian race forsake their king,

Where spears environ, and where javelins sing!

He spoke; then four times round his head he whirl'd. His ponderous spear, and midst the foremost hurl'd; Deep through the ranks the forceful weapon past, And many a gasping warrior sigh'd his plast.

P And many a gasping warrior sigh'd bis last—This, which is almost literal from Muites lançarao o ultimo suspiro---and the preceding circumstance of Don John's brandishing his lance four times are poetical, and in the spirit of Homer. They are omitted, however, by Castera, who substitutes the following in their place, "Il dit, et d'un bras, &c. — He said, and with an arm whose blows are inevitable, he threw his javelin against the sterce Maldonat. Death and the weapon went together. Maldonat fell, pierced with a large wound, and his horse tumbled over him." Besides Maldonat, Castera has, in this battle, introduced several other names which have no place in Camoens. Carrillo, Robledo, John of Lorca, Salazar of Seville were killed, he tells us: And, "Velasques and Sanches, natives of Toledo, Galbes, surnamed the Soldier without Fear, Montanches, Oropesa, and Mondonedo, all fix of proved valour, fell by the hand of young Antony, qui porte dans le combat ou plus d'adresse ou plus de bonheur qu'eux, who brought to the fight either more address or better fortune than these." Not a word of this is in the Portuguese.

The fate of another hero shall conclude the fpecimens of the manner of Castera. The following is literally translated: "Guevar, a vain man, nourished in indolence, stained his arms and face with the blood of the dead whom he found stretched on the dust. Under the cover of this frivolous imposture, he pretended to pass himself for a formid-able warrior. He published, with a high voice, the number of the enemies he had thrown to the ground. Don Pedro interrupted him with a blow of his fabre: Guevar lost his life; his head, full of the fumes of a ridiculous pride, bounded far away from his body, which remained defiled with its own blood; a just and terrible punishment for the lies he had told." It is almost unnecessary to add, that there is not one word of this in the original.

With noble shame inspired, and mounting rage,
His bands rush on, and foot to foot engage;
Thick bursting sparkles from the blows aspire;
Such slashes blaze, their swords seem dipt in sire;
The belts of steel and plates of brass are riven,
And wound for wound, and death for death is given.

The first in honour of Saint Jago's 'band,
A naked ghost now sought the gloomy strand;
And he, of Calatrave the sovereign knight,
Girt with whole troops his arm had slain in fight,
Descended murmuring to the shades of night.
Blaspheming heaven, and gash'd with many a wound
Brave Nunio's rebel kindred gnaw'd the ground,
And curst their fate, and dy'd. Ten thousands more
Who held no title and no office bore,
And nameless nobles who, promiscuous fell,
Appeas'd that day the foaming dog of hell.
Now low the proud Castilian standard lies
Beneath the Lusian slag, a vanquish'd prize.

4 Their fwords feem diet in fire—This is as literal as the idiom of the two languages would allow. Dryden has a thought like that of this couplet, but which is not in his original:

Their bucklers clash; thick blows descend from high,
And stakes of fire from their hard helmets sty.

DRYD. VIRG. EN. XII.

Grand Master of the order of St. James, named Don Pedro Nunio. He was not killed, however, in this battle, which was fought on the plains of Aljubarota, but in that of Valverda, which immediately followed. The Reader may perhaps be furprised to find, that every soldier mentioned in these notes is a Don, a Lord. The solowing piece of history will account for the number of the Portuguese nobles. Don Alonzo Enriquez, Count of Portugal, was saluted king by his army at the battle of Ourique; in return, his Majesty dignified every man in his army with the rank of nobility. Vid. the 9th of the Stat. of Lamego.

V .

With furious madness fired, and stern disdain,
The fierce Iberians to the fight again
Rush headlong; groans and yellings of 'despair.
With horrid uproar rend the trembling air.
Hot boils the blood, thirst burns, and every breast
Pants, every limb with fainty weight opprest
Slow now obeys the will's stern ire, and slow.
From every sword descends the feeble blow;
Till rage grew languid, and tired slaughter found
No arm to combat, and no breast to wound.
Now from the field Casteel's proud monarch slies,
In wild dismay he rowls his maddening eyes,
And leads the pale-lipt slight, who, wing'd with fear,
As drifted smoke at distance disappear,

'The last efforts of rage and despair are thus described in Pope's translation of the fifth battle at the ships. It, XV.

Thou wouldst have thought, so surious was their fire, No force could tame them, and no toil could tire; As if new vigour from new fights they won, And the long battle was but then begun.
Greece yet unconquer'd kept alive the evar, Secure of death, confiding in despair.
'You in proud hopes already view'd the main, Bright with the blaze, and red with heroes slain; Like strength is selt from hope and from despair, And each contends as his were all the war.

This tyrant, whose unjust pretensions to the crown of Portugal laid his own and that kingdom in blood, was on his final deseat overwhelmed with all the frenzy of gries. In the night after the decisive battle of Aljubarata, he sled upwards of thirty miles upon a mule. Don Laurence, archbishop of Braga, in a letter written in old Portuguese to Don John, abbot of Alcobaza, gives this account of his behaviour. "O condestrabre is a me far saber sa o rey de Castella se viera

" à Santaren como homen tresvaliado, quenz " maldezia seu viver, è puxava polas bar-" bas; è à bo fe, bom amigo, melbor e que " o faga ca non fagermolo nos, ca homen, quem suas barbas arrepela mao lavor sa-ria das albeas. i. e. The constable has " informed me that he faw the king of "Castile at Santaren, who behaved as a madman, cursing his existence, and tearing the hairs of his beard. And in " good faith, my good friend, it is better that he should do so to himself than to " us; the man who thus plucks his own " beard, would be much better pleased to do so to others." The writer of this. letter, though a prelate, fought at the battle of Aljubarota, where he received on the face a large wound from a fabre. Castera relates this anecdote of him. The flattery of a sculptor had omitted the deep scar: when the archbishop saw the statue, he laid hold of an attendant's fword, with which he disfigured the face. I have now, said he, supplied what it wanted.

Blaspheming

Blaspheming fate, and cursing him who first Forged horrid arms, and led to wars accurst.

The festive days by heroes old 'ordain'd.

The glorious wictor on the field remain'd.

The funeral rites and holy vows he paid:

Yet not the while the restless Nunio staid;

O'er Tago's waves his gallant bands he led,

And humbled Spain in every province bled:

Sevilia's standard on his spear he bore,

And Andalusia's ensigns steept in gore.

Low in the dust distrest Castilia mourn'd,

And bathed in tears each eye to heaven was turn'd;

The orphan's, widow's, and the hoary sire's;

And heaven relenting quench'd the raging sires

Of mutual hate: from England's happy shore:

The peaceful seas two lovely sisters "bore.

The festive days by heroes old ordain'd.

—As a certain proof of the victory, it was required, by the honour of these ages, that the victor should encamp three days on the field of battle. By this knight-errantry, the advantages which ought to have been pursued were frequently lost. Don John, however, though he complied with the reigning ideas of honour, sent Don Nunio, with a proper army, to reap the fruits of his victory.

"Castera's note on this place is literally thus: "They were the daughters of John duke of Lancaster, fon of Edward IV. of England, both of great beauty: the eldest, named Catharine, was married to the king of Castile, the youngest, Isabel, to the king of Portugal." This is all a mistake. John of Portugal, about a year after the battle of Aljubarota, married Philipa, eldest daughter of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, son of Edward III. whoaffisted the king, his son-in-law, in anirruption into Caltile, and at the end of the campaign promised to return with more numerous forces for the next. But this was prevented by the marriage of his youngest daughter Catalina with Don Henry, eldest son of the king of Castile. The king of Portugal on this entered Galicia, and reduced the cities of Tuy and Salvaterra. A truce followed. While the tyrant of Castile meditated a new war, he was killed by a fall from his horse, and leaving no issue by his queen Beatrix, the king of Portugal's daughter, all pretensions on that crown ceased. The truce was now prolonged for fifteen years, and though not strictly kept, yet at last the influence of the English queen Catalina prevailed, and a long peace, happy for both kingdoms, ensued.

The rival monarchs to the nuptial bed
In joyful hour the royal virgins led,
And holy peace affum'd her blifsful reign,
Again the peafant joy'd, the landscape smiled again.

But John's brave breaft to warlike cares innured, With conscious shame the sloth of ease endured. When not a foe awaked his rage in Spain The valiant Hero braved the foamy main; The first, nor meanest, of our kings who bore The Lusian thunders to the Afric shore. O'er the wild waves the victor-banners flow'd, Their filver wings a thousand eagles shew'd; And proudly swelling to the whistling gales The feas were whiten'd with a thousand fails. Beyond the columns by Alcides placed To bound the world, the zealous warrior past. The shrines of Hagar's race, the shrines of lust, And moon-crown'd mosques lay smoaking in the dust. O'er Abyla's high steep his lance he raised, On Ceuta's lofty towers his standard blazed: · Ceuta, the refuge of the traitor train, His vassal now, ensures the peace of Spain.

But ah, how foon the blaze of glory v dies!

Illustrious John ascends his native skies.

w The character of this great prince comment on the enthusiasm of Camoens, claims a place in these notes, as it affords a who has made him the hero of his episode.

His gallant offspring prove their genuine strain, And added lands increase the Lusian reign.

Yet not the first of heroes Edward shone; His happiest days long hours of evil own. He saw, secluded from the chearful day, His sainted brother pine his years away. O glorious youth in captive chains, to thee What suiting honours can thy land *decree!

His birth, excellent education, and masterly conduct when regent, have already been mentioned. The same justice, prudence, and heroism always accompanied him when king. He had the art to join the most winning affability with all the manly dignity of the sovereign. To those who were his friends, when a private man, he was particularly attentive. His nobility dined at his table, he frequently made vifits to them, and introduced among them the taste for, and the love of letters. As he felt the advantages of education, he took the utmost care of that of his children. He had many fons, and he himself often instructed them in solid and useful knowledge, and was amply repaid. He lived to see them men, men of parts and of action, whose only emulation was to shew affection to his person, and to support his administration by their great abilities. One of his fons, Don Henry, duke of Vifeo, was that great prince whose ardent passion for maritime affairs gave birth to all the modern improvements in navigation. The clergy, who had disturbed almost every other reign, were so convinced of the wisdom of his, that they confessed he ought to be supported out of the treasures of the church, and granted him the church plate to be coined. When the Pope ordered a rigorous enquiry to be made into his having brought ecclefiastics before lay tribunals, the clergy had the fingular honefly to defert what was stilled the church immunities, and to own that justice had been impartially administered. He died in the seventy-fixth year of his age, and in the forty-eighth of his reign. His affection tohis queen Philippa made him fond of the English, whose friendship he cultivated, and by whom he was frequently assisted.

x Camoens, in this instance, has raised the character of one brother at the other's expence, to give his poem an air of the old romance. The fiege of Tangier was proposed. The king's brothers differed in their opinions: that of Don Fernand, tho' a knight errant adventure, was approved of by the young nobility. The infants Henry and Fernand, at the head of 7000 men, laid fiege to Tangier, and were furrounded by a numerous army of Moors, fome writers fay fix hundred thousand. On condition that the Portuguese army should be allowed to return home, the infants promised to deliver Ceuta. The Moors gladly accepted of the terms, but demanded one of the infants as an hostage. Fernand offered him-felf, and was left. The king was willing to comply with the terms to relieve his brother, but the court confidered the value of Ceuta, and would not confent. The Pope also interposed his authority, that Ceuta should be kept as a check on the infidels, and proposed to raise a Crusade for the delivery of Fernand. In the meanwhile large offers were made for his liberty. These were rejected by the Moors, who would accept of nothing but Ceuta, of whose vast importance they were no firangers. When negotiation failed, king Edward affembled a large army to effect his brother's release, but just as he was setting out, he was seized with the plague, and died, leaving orders with his

Thy nation proffer'd, and the foe with joy
For Ceuta's towers prepared to yield the boy;
The princely hostage nobly spurns the thought
Of freedom and of life so dearly bought:
The raging vengeance of the Moors desies,
Gives to the clanking chains his limbs, and dies
A dreary prison death. Let noisy same
No more unequall'd'hold her Codrus' name;
Her Regulus, her Curtius boast no more,
Nor those the honour'd Decian name who bore.
The splendor of a court, to them unknown,
Exchang'd for deathful Fate's most awful frown
To distant times through every land shall blaze
The self-devoted Lusian's nobler praise.

Now to the tomb the hapless king descends, His son Alonzo brighter fate attends.

queen to deliver up Ceuta for the release of his brother. This, however, was never performed. Don Fernand remained with the Moors till his death. The magnanimity of his behaviour gained him their efteem and admiration, nor is there good proof that he received any extraordinary rigorous treatment; the contrary is rather to be inferred from the romantic notions of military honour which then prevailed among the Moors. Some, however, whom Castera follows, make his sufferings little inferior to those, without proof likewise, ascribed to Regulus. Don Fernand is to this day esteemed as a saint and martyr in Portugal, and his memory is commemorated on the fifth of June. King Edward reigned only five years and a month. He was the most eloquent man in his dominions, spoke and wrote Latin elegantly, was author of several books, one on horsemanship, in which art he excelled. He was brave in the field, active in business, and rendered his country infinite service by reducing the laws to a regular code. He was knight of the order of the Garter, which honour was conferred upon him by his cousin Henry V. of England. In one instance he gave great offence to the superstitious populace. He despised the advice of a Jew astrologer, who entreated him to delay his coronation, because the stars that day were unfavourable. To this the missfortune of Tangier was ascribed, and the people were always on the alarm, as if some terrible disaster were impending over them

Alonzo! dear to Lusus' race the name; Nor his the meanest in the rolls of fame. His might refistless prostrate Afric own'd, Beneath his yoke the Mauritinians groan'd, And still they groan beneath the Lusian sway. 'Twas his in victor-pomp to bear away The golden apples from Hesperia's shore, Which but the fon of Jove had fnatch'd before. The palm and laurel round his temples bound, Display'd his triumphs on the Moorish ground. When proud Arzilla's strength, Alcazer's towers, And Tingia, boastful of her numerous powers, Beheld their adamantine walls o'erturn'd, Their ramparts levell'd, and their temples burn'd. Great was the day: the meanest sword that fought Beneath the Lufian flag fuch wonders wrought As from the Muse might challenge endless fame, Though low their station, and without a name.

Now stung with wild Ambition's madning fires,
To proud Castilia's throne the king 'aspires.
The Lord of Arragon, from Cadiz' walls,
And hoar Pyrene's sides his legions calls;

the kingdom of Castile, Don Alouzo, king of Portugal, obtained a dispensation from the pope to marry his niece, Donna Joanna. After a bloody war, the ambitious views of Alonzo and his courtiers were deseated.

y When Henry IV. of Castile died, he declared that the infanta Joanna was his heires, in preference to his sister, Donna Ifabella, married to Don Ferdinand, son to the king of Arragon. In hopes to attain

The numerous legions to his standards throng, And war, with horrid strides, now stalks along. With emulation fired, the * prince beheld His warlike fire ambitious of the field: Scornful of eafe, to aid his arms he fped, Nor fped in vain: The raging combat bled; Alonzo's ranks with carnage gored, Difmay Spread her cold wings, and shook his firm array, To flight she hurried; while with brow serene The martial boy beheld the deathful scene. With curving movement o'er the field he rode, Th' opposing troops his wheeling squadrons mow'd: The purple dawn and evening fun beheld His tents encampt affert the conquer'd field. Thus when the ghost of Julius hover'd o'er Philippi's plain, appeafed with Roman gore, Octavius' legions left the field in flight, While happier Marcus triumph'd in the fight.

When endless night had seal'd his mortal eyes,
And brave Alonzo's spirit sought the skies,
The second of the name, the valiant John,
Our thirteenth monarch, now ascends the throne.
To seize immortal same, his mighty mind,
What man had never dared before, design'd;

^{*} The Prince of Portugal.

That glorious labour which I now pursue, Through feas unfail'd to find the shores that view The day-star, rising from his watery bed, The first grey beams of infant morning shed. Selected messengers his will obey; Through Spain and France they hold their vent'rous way. Through Italy they reach the port that gave The fair Parthenope an honour'd z grave; That shore which oft has felt the servile chain, But now smiles happy in the care of Spain. Now from the port the brave advent'rers bore, And cut the billows of the Rhodian shore; Now reach the strand where noble Pompey 'bled; And now, repair'd with rest, to Memphis sped; And now, ascending by the vales of Nile, Whose waves pour fatness o'er the grateful soil, Through Ethiopia's peaceful dales they stray'd, Where their glad eyes Messiah's rites b survey'd: And now they pass the famed Arabian flood, Whose waves of old in wondrous ridges stood, While Israel's favour'd race the fable bottom trode: Behind them glistening to the morning skies, The mountains named from Izmael's offspring 'rife;

² Parthenope was one of the Syrens. Enraged because she could not allure Ulyffes, she threw herself into the sea. Her corps was thrown ashore, and buried where Naples now stands.

² The coast of Alexandria.

b Among the Christians of Prester John, or Abyssynia.

The Nabathean mountains; fo named from Nabaoth, the son of Ishmael.

174

Now round their steps the blest Arabia spreads Her groves of odour, and her balmy meads, And every breaft, inspired with glee, inhales The grateful fragrance of Sabæa's gales: Now past the Persian gulph their rout ascends Where Tygris wave with proud Euphrates blends: Illustrious streams, where still the native shews Where Babel's haughty tower unfinish'd rose: From thence through climes unknown, their daring course Beyond where Trajan forced his way, they 'force; Carmanian hords, and Indian tribes they faw, And many a barbarous rite, and many a dlaw Their fearch explored; but to their native shore, Enrich'd with knowledge, they return'd no more. The glad completion of the Fate's decree, Kind heaven referved, Emmanuel, for thee. The crown, and high ambition of thy ' fires, To thee descending, waked thy latent fires, And to command the fea from pole to pole, With restless wish inflamed thy mighty soul.

Now from the sky the sacred light withdrawn, O'er heaven's clear azure shone the stars of dawn,

Arabia Fœlix. Vid. Dion. Cass. Euseb. Chron. p. 206.

4 Qui mores bominum multorum vidit.—

e Reyond where Trajan—The Emperor Trajan extended the bounds of the Roman Empire in the East, far beyond any of his predecessors. His conquests reached to the river Tigris, near which stood the city of Ctesphon, which he subdued. The Roman Historians boasted that India was entirely conquered by him; but they could only mean ^e Emmanuel was cousin to the late king John II. and grandson to king Edward, son of John I.

Deep Silence spread her gloomy wings around, And human griefs were wrapt in fleep profound. The monarch flumber'd on his golden bed, Yet anxious cares possest his thoughtful head; His generous foul, intent on public good, The glorious duties of his birth review'd. When fent by heaven a facred dream inspired His labouring mind, and with its radiance fired: High to the clouds his towering head was rear'd, New worlds, and nations fierce and strange appear'd; The purple dawning o'er the mountains flow'd, The forest-boughs with yellow splendor glow'd; High from the steep two copious glassy streams Roll'd down, and glitter'd in the morning beams; Here various monsters of the wild were seen, And birds of plumage, azure, scarlet, green: Here various herbs, and flowers of various bloom; There black as night the forest's horrid gloom, Whose shaggy brakes, by human step untrod, Darken'd the glaring lion's dread abode. Here as the monarch fix'd his wondering eyes, Two hoary fathers from the streams arise; Their aspect rustic, yet a reverend grace Appeared majestic on their wrinkled face: Their tawny beards uncomb'd, and fweepy long, Adown their knees in shaggy ringlets hung;

Frem

From every lock the chrystal drops distill,
And bathe their limbs as in a trickling rill;
Gay wreaths of flowers, of fruitage, and of boughs,
Nameless in Europe, crown'd their furrow'd brows,
Bent o'er his staff, more silver'd o'er with years,
Worn with a longer way, the One appears;
Who now slow beckoning with his wither'd hand,
As now advanced before the king they stand;

O thou, whom worlds to Europe yet unknown, Are doom'd to yield, and dignify thy crown; To thee our golden shores the Fates decree; Our necks, unbow'd before, shall bend to thee. Wide thro' the world resounds our wealthy same; Haste, speed thy prows, that sated wealth to claim. From Paradise my hallowed waters spring; The sacred Ganges I, my brother king Th' illustrious author of the Indian name: Yet toil shall languish, and the sight shall slame; Our sairest lawns with streaming gore shall smoke, Ere yet our shoulders bend beneath thy yoke; But thou shalt conquer: all thine eyes survey, With all our various tribes shall own thy sway.

He spoke; and melting in a silvery stream Both disappear'd; when waking from his dream, The wondering monarch thrill'd with awe divine, Weighs in his lofty thoughts the facred fign.

Now morning burfting from the eastern fky. Spreads o'er the clouds the blushing rose's dye, The nations wake, and at the fovereign's call The Lufian nobles crowd the palace hall. The vision of his sleep the monarch tells: Each heaving breast with joyful wonder swells: Fulfil, they cry, the facred fign obey, And spread the canvas for the Indian sea. Instant My looks with troubled ardour burn'd, When keen on Me his eyes the monarch turn'd: What he beheld I know not, but I know, Big fwell'd my bosom with a prophet's glow: And long my mind, with wondrous bodings fired, Had to the glorious dreadful toil aspired: Yet to the king, whate'er my looks betrayed, My looks the omen of fuccess displayed. When with that fweetness in his mien exprest, Which unrefifted wins the generous breaft, Great are the dangers, great the toils, he cried, Ere glorious honours crown the victor's pride. If in the glorious strife the hero fall, He proves no danger could his foul appall;

And but to dare fo great a toil, shall raife Each age's wonder, and immortal praise. For this dread toil new oceans to explore, To spread the fail where fail ne'er flow'd before, For this dread labour, to your valour duc, From all your peers I chuse, O Vasco, you. Dread as it is, yet light the task shall be To you my GAMA, as perform'd for Me. My heart could bear no more——Let skies on fire, Let frozen seas, let horrid war conspire, I dare them all, I cried, and but repine That one poor life is all I can refign. Did to my lot Alcides' labours fall, For you my joyful heart would dare them all; The ghaftly realms of death could man invade For you my steps should trace the ghastly shade.

While thus with loyal zeal my bosom swell'd,
That panting zeal my Prince with joy beheld:
Honour'd with gifts I stood, but honour'd more
By that esteem my joyful Sovereign bore.
That generous praise which fires the soul of worth,
And gives new virtues unexpected birth,
That praise even now my heaving bosom fires,
Inslames my courage, and each wish inspires.

Moved

Moved by affection, and allured by fame, A gallant youth, who bore the dearest name, Paulus my brother, boldly fued to share My toils, my dangers, and my fate in war; And brave Coëllo urged the Hero's claim To dare each hardship, and to join our fame: For glory both with restless ardour burn'd, And filken ease for horrid danger spurn'd; Alike renown'd in council or in field, The fnare to baffle, or the fword to wield. Through Lisbon's youth the kindling ardour ran, And bold ambition thrill'd from man to man; And each the meanest of the venturous band With gifts stood honour'd by the Sovereign's hand. Heavens! what a fury swell'd each warrior's breast, When each, in turn, the smiling King addrest! Fired by his words the direft toils they fcorn'd, And with the horrid lust of danger fiercely burn'd.

With fuch bold rage the youth of Mynia glow'd, When the first keel the Euxine surges plow'd; When bravely venturous for the golden sleece Orac'lous Argo sail'd from wondering 'Greece.

their lives to the caprices of the waves have need of a penetrating forefight, that they may not be surprised by sudden tempests. Castera.

Orac'leus Argo — According to fable, the vessel of the Argonauts spoke and prophecied. The ancients, I suppose, by this meant to infinuate, that those who trust

Where Tago's yellow stream the harbour laves,
And slowly mingles with the ocean's waves,
In warlike pride my gallant navy rode,
And proudly o'er the beach my soldiers strode.
Sailors and land-men marshall'd o'er the strand,
In garbs of various hue around me stand;
Each earnest first to plight the sacred vow,
Oceans unknown and gulphs untry'd to plow:
Then turning to the ships their sparkling eyes,
With joy they heard the breathing winds arise;
Elate with joy beheld the slapping sail,
And purple standards floating on the gale:
While each presaged that great as Argo's same,
Our sleet should give some starry band a name.

Where foaming on the shore the tide appears,
A sacred sane its hoary arches rears:
Dim o'er the sea the evening shades descend,
And at the holy shrine devout we bend:
There, while the tapers o'er the altar blaze,
Our prayers and earnest vows to heaven we raise.
"Safe through the deep, where every yawning wave

- where every yawning wa
- " Still to the Sailor's eye displays his grave;
- " Through howling tempests, and through gulphs untry'd,
- " O! mighty God! be thou our watchful guide."

While

While kneeling thus before the facred shrine, In Holy Faith's most solemn rite we join; Our peace with heaven the bread of peace confirms, And meek contrition every bosom warms: Sudden the lights extinguish'd, all around Dread filence reigns, and midnight gloom profound: A facred horror pants on every breath, And each firm breast devotes itself to death, An offer'd facrifice, fworn to obey My nod, and follow where I lead the way; Now prostrate round the hallow'd shrine we blie, Till rofy morn beforeads the eastern fky; Then, breathing fixt refolves, my daring mates March to the ships, while pour'd from Lisbon's gates, Thousands on thousands crowding, press along, A woeful, weeping, melancholy throng. A thousand white-robed priests our steps attend, And prayers, and holy vows to heaven ascend; A fcene fo folemn, and the tender woe Of parting friends, constrained my tears to flow.

die cum multi non illius tantum gratia, sed aliorum etiam, qui illi comites erant, convenissent, suit ab omnibus in scaphis deductus. Neque solum homines reiigiosi, sed reliqui omnes voce maxima cum lacrymis à Deo precabantur, ut benè & prosperè illa tam periculosa navigatio omnibus eveniret, & universi re benè gesta incolumes in patriam redirent.

This fact is according to history: Aberat Olysippone prope littus quatuor passuum millia templum sanè religiosum et sanctum ab Henrico in honorem sanctissima virginis ediscatum. In id Gama pridie illius diei, quo erat navem conscensurus, se recepit, ut noctem cum religiosis hominibus qui in ædibus templo conjunctis habitabant, in precibus et votis consumeret. Sequenti

To weigh our anchors from our native shore -To dare new oceans never dared before Perhaps to fee my native coast no more -Forgive, O king, if as a man I feel, I bear no bosom of obdurate steel. (The godlike hero here supprest the figh, And wiped the tear-drop from his manly eye; Then thus refuming —) All the peopled shore An awful, filent look of anguish wore; Affection, friendship, all the kindred ties Of spouse and parent languish'd in their eyes: As men they never should again behold, Self-offer'd victims to destruction fold, On us they fixt the eager look of woe, While tears o'er every cheek began to flow; When thus aloud, Alas! my fon, my fon, An hoary Sire exclaims, oh! whither run, My heart's fole joy, my trembling age's stay, To yield thy limbs the dread fea-monster's prey! To feek thy burial in the raging wave, And leave me cheerless finking to the grave! Was it for this I watch'd thy tender years, And bore each fever of a father's fears! Alas! my boy! — His voice is heard no more, The female shrick resounds along the shore:

With hair dishevell'd, through the yielding crowd A lovely bride springs on, and screams aloud; Oh! where, my husband, where to seas unknown, Where would'st thou sly me, and my love disown! And wilt thou, cruel, to the deep consign That valued life, the joy, the soul of mine: And must our loves, and all our kindred train Of rapt endearments, all expire in vain! All the dear transports of the warm embrace, When mutual love inspired each raptured face! Must all, alas! be scatter'd in the wind, Nor thou bestow one lingering look behind!

Such the lorn parents' and the spouses' woes,
Such o'er the strand the voice of wailing rose;
From breast to breast the soft contagion crept,
Moved by the woeful sound the children wept;
The mountain ecchoes catch the big-swoln sighs,
And through the dales prolong the matron's cries;
The yellow sands with tears are silver'd o'er,
Our fate the mountains and the beach deplore.
Yet sirm we march, nor turn one glance aside
On hoary parent, or on lovely bride.
Though glory fired our hearts, too well we knew
What soft affection and what love could do.

The last embrace the bravest worst can bear:
The bitter yearnings of the parting tear
Sullen we shun, unable to sustain
The melting passion of such tender pain.

Now on the lofty decks prepared we stand,
When towering o'er the crowd that veil'd the strand,
A reverend higure fixt each wondering cye,
And beckoning thrice he waved his hand on high,
And thrice his hoary curls he sternly shook,
While grief and anger mingled in his look;

By this old man is personified the populace of Portugal. The endeavours to difcover the East-Indies by the Southern ocean, for about eighty years had been the favourite topic of complaint; and never was any measure of government more unpopular than the expedition of Gama. Emmanuel's council were almost unanimous against the attempt. Some dreaded the introduction of wealth, and its attendants luxury and effeminacy; while others affirmed, that no adequate advantages could arise from so perilons and remote a navigation. Others, with a forefight peculiar to Politicians, were alarmed, lest the Egyptian Sultan, who was powerful in the East, should fignify his displeasure; and others foresaw, that success would combine all the Princes of Christendom in a league for the destruction of Portugal. In short, if glory, interest, or the propagation of the gospel, were desired, Africa and Ethiopia, they said, afforded, both nearer and more advantageous fields. The expressions of the thousands who crouded the shore when Gama gave his sails to the wind, are thus expressed by Osorius, from whom the above facts are felected .-

A multis tamen interim is fletus atque lamentatio fiebat, ut funus efferre viderentur. Sic enim dicebant: En quo miseros mortales provexit cupiditas et ambitio? Potuitne gravius supplicium hominibus istis constitui, si in se scelestum aliquod facinus admisssent? Est enim illis immensi maris longitudo peragranda, fluctus immanes difficillima navigatione superandi, vitæ discrimen in locis infinitis obeundum. Non fuit multò tolerabilius, in terra quovis genere mortis absumi, quam tam procul à patria marinis fluctibus fepeliri. Hæc et alia multa in hanc sententiam dicebant, cum omnia multò trifliora fingere præ metu cogerentur. — The tender emotion and fixt resolution of Gama, and the earnest passion of the multitudes on the shore, are thus added by the same venerable historian: Gama tamen quamvis lacrymas suorum desiderio funderet, rei tamen benè gerendæ fiducia confirmatus, alacriter in navem faustis ominibus conscendit.... Qui in littore consistebant, non prius abscedere voluerunt, quàm naves vento secundo plenissimis velis ab omnium conspectu remotæ funt.

Then to its height his faultering voice he rear'd, And through the fleet these awful words were heard:

O frantic thirst of honour and of fame. The crowd's blind tribute, a fallacious name; What stings, what plagues, what secret scourges curst, Torment those bosoms where thy pride is nurst! What dangers threaten, and what deaths destroy The hapless youth, whom thy vain gleams decoy! By thee, dire Tyrant of the noble mind, What dreadful woes are pour'd on human kind: Kingdoms and Empires in confusion hurl'd, What streams of gore have drench'd the hapless world! Thou dazzling meteor, vain as fleeting air, What new-dread horror dost thou now prepare! High founds thy voice of India's pearly shore, Of endless triumphs and of countless store: Of other worlds fo tower'd thy swelling boast, Thy golden dreams when Paradife was loft, When thy big promise steep'd the world in gore, And fimple innocence was known no more. And fay, has fame fo dear, fo dazzling charms? Must brutal fierceness and the trade of arms, Conquest, and laurels dipt in blood, be prized, While life is fcorn'd, and all its joys despised. And fay, does zeal for holy faith inspire To spread its mandates, thy avow'd defire?

Behold the Hagarene in armour stands, Treads on thy borders, and the foe demands: A thousand cities own his lordly fway, A thousand various shores his nod obey. Through all these regions, all these cities, scorn'd Is thy religion, and thine altars fprun'd. A foe renown'd in arms the brave require; That high-plumed foe, renown'd for martial fire, Before thy gates his shining spear displays, Whilst thou wouldst fondly dare the watery maze, Enfeebled leave thy native land behind, On shores unknown a foe unknown to find. Oh! madness of ambition! thus to dare Dangers fo fruitless, fo remote a war! That Fame's vain flattery may thy name adorn, And thy proud titles on her flag be borne: Thee, Lord of Persia, thee, of India Lord, O'er Ethiopia's vast, and Araby adored!

Curst be the man who first on floating wood,
Forsook the beach, and braved the treacherous flood!
Oh! never, never may the facred Nine,
To crown his brows, the hallow'd wreath entwine;
Nor may his name to future times resound,
Oblivion be his meed, and hell prosound!

Curft

Curst be the wretch, the fire of heaven who stole, And with ambition first debauch'd the foul! What woes, Prometheus, walk the frighten'd earth! To what dread flaughter has thy pride given birth! On proud Ambition's pleasing gales upborne, One boafts to guide the chariot of the morn; And one on treacherous pinions foaring 'high, O'er ocean's waves would fail the liquid fky: Dash'd from their height they mourn'd their blighted aim; One gives a river, one a fea the name! Alas! the poor reward of that gay meteor Fame! Yet fuch the fury of the mortal race, Though Fame's fair promife ends in foul difgrace, Though conquest still the victor's hope betrays, The prize a shadow, or a rainbow blaze, Yet still through fire and raging feas they run To catch the gilded shade, and fink undone!

1 Alluding to the fables of Phaeton and Icarus.

The departure of the fleet from the Tagus.

—In no circumstance does the judgment and art of Homer appear more conspicuous, than in the constant attention he pays to his proposed subjects, the wrath of Achilles, and the sufferings of Ulysses. He bestows the utmost care on every incident that could possibly impress our minds with high ideas of the determined rage of the injured hero, and of the invincible patience of the πολύτλας δτος 'Οδυσσεύς. Virgil throughout the Eneid has followed the same course. Every incident that could possibly tend to magnify the dangers and difficulties of the wanderings of Æneas, in his long fearch for the promised Italy, is set before us in the fullest magnitude. But, however, this method of ennobling the Epic by paying the utmost attention to give a grandeur to every circumstance of the proposed subject, may have been neglected by Voltaire in his Henriade, (where political declamation seems to have been his principal care,) and by some other moderns, who have attempted the Epopea; it has not been omitted by Camoens. The Portuguese Poet has, with great art, conducted the voyage of Gama. Every circumstance attending it is represented with magnificence and dignity. John II. designs what had never been attempted before. Messengers are sent by land to discover the climate and riches of India. Their rout is described in the manner of Homer. The palm of discovery, however, is reserved for a succeeding monarch. Emmanuel is warned by a dream, which affords another striking instance of the spirit of the Grecian Bard. The enthusiasm which the king beholds on the aspect of Gama is a noble stroke of poetry; the solemnity of the night fpent in devotion; the fullen refolution of the Adventurers when going aboard the fleet; the affecting grief of their friends and fellow-citizens, who viewed them as felf-devoted victims, whom they were never more to behold; and the angry exclamations of the venerable old man, give a dignity and interesting pathos to the departure of the fleet of Gama, greatly superior to that in the Eneid, where the Trojans leave a colony of Invalids in Sicily. In the Odysfley there is nothing which can be called similar.

END OF THE FOURTH BOOK.

THE

L U S I A D.

BOOK V.

HILE on the beach the hoary father stood And spoke the murmurs of the multitude, We spread the canvas to the rising gales, The gentle winds distend the snowy fails.

As from our dear-loved native shore we sly Our votive shouts, redoubled, rend the sky; "Success, success," far ecchoes o'er the tide, While our broad hulks the foamy waves divide.

From Leo now, the lordly star of day, Intensely blazing, shot his siercest ray; When slowly gliding from our wishful eyes, The Lusian mountains mingled with the skies;

B b 2

Tago's

Tago's loved ftream, and Syntra's mountains cold-Dim fading now, we now no more behold; And still with yearning hearts our eyes explore, Till one dim speck of land appears no more. Our native foil now far behind, we ply The lonely dreary waste of seas and boundless sky: Through the wild deep our venturous navy bore, Where but our Henry plough'd the wave * before : The verdant islands, first by him descry'd, We past; and now in prospect opening wide, Far to the left, increasing on the view, Rose Mauritania's hills of paly blue: Far to the right the restless ocean roared. Whose bounding surges never keel explored; If bounding shore, as Reason deems, divide The vast Atlantic from the Indian b tide.

Now from her woods, with fragrant bowers adorn'd, From fair Madeira's purple coast we 'turn'd: Cyprus and Paphos' vales the smiling loves Might leave with joy for fair Madeira's groves; b The discovery of some of the West-Indian islands by Columbus was made in 1492 and 1493. His discovery of the continent of America was not till 1498. The fleet of Gama sailed from the Tagus in 1497.

^a See the life of Don Henry, Prince of Portugal, in the Preface.

c Called by the ancients Infalæ Purpurariæ. Now Madeira and Porto Sancto. The former was fo named by Juan Gonzales, and Tristan Vaz, from the Spanish word Madera, wood. These discoverers were sent out by the great Don Henry.

A shore so flowery, and so sweet an air, Venus might build her dearest temple there. Onward we pass Massilia's barren strand, A waste of wither'd grass and burning fand; Where his thin herds the meagre native leads, Where not a rivulet laves the doleful meads: Nor herbs nor fruitage deck the woodland maze; O'er the wild waste the stupid offrich strays, In devious fearch to pick her feanty meal, Whose fierce digestion gnaws the temper'd steel. From the green verge, where Tigitania ends, To Ethiopia's line the dreary wild extends. Now past the limit, which his course divides, When to the North the Sun's bright chariot rides, We leave the winding bays and fwarthy shores, Where Senegal's black wave impetuous roars; A flood, whose course a thousand tribes surveys, The tribes who blacken'd in the fiery blaze, When Phaeton, devious from the folar height, Gave Afric's fons the fable hue of night. And now from far the Lybian cape is feen, Now by my mandate named the Cape of Green; Where midst the billows of the ocean smiles A flowery fifter-train, the happy ifles, d Called by Ptolemy Caput Assinarium.

Our onward prows the murmuring furges lave: And now our vessels plough the gentle wave, Where the blue islands, named of Hesper old, Their fruitful bosoms to the deep unfold. Here changeful Nature shews her various face, And frolicks o'er the slopes with wildest grace: Here our bold fleet their ponderous anchors threw. The fickly cherish, and our stores renew. From him, the warlike guardian power of Spain, Whose spear's dread lightning o'er th' embattled plain Has oft o'erwhelm'd the Moors in dire difmay, And fixt the fortune of the doubtful day; From him we name our station of repair, And Jago's name that isle shall ever bear. The northern winds now curl'd the blackening main, Our fails unfurl'd we plough the tide again: Round Afric's coast our winding course we steer, Where bending to the East the shores appear. Here Jalofo its wide extent 'displays, And vast Mandinga shews its numerous bays; that travellers pass under it without any other inconveniency than the prodigious noise. The Gambea, or Rio Grande runs 180 leagues, but is not so far navigable. It carries more water, and runs with less noise than the other, though filled with many rivers which water the country of Mandinga. Both rivers are branches of the Niger. Their waters have this remarkable quality;

e The province of Jalofo lies between the two rivers, the Gambea and the Zanago. The latter has other names in the feveral countries through which it runs. In its course it makes many islands, inhabited only by wild beasts. It is navigable 150 leagues, at the end of which it is crossed by a supendous ridge of perpendicular rocks, over which the river rushes with such violence,

Whose mountains' fides, though parch'd and barren, hold, In copious store, the feeds of beamy gold. The Gambea here his serpent journey takes, And through the lawns a thousand windings makes; A thousand swarthy tribes his current laves Ere mix his waters with th' Atlantic waves. The Gorgades we past, that hated 8 shore, Famed for its terrors by the bards of yore; Where but one eye by Phorcus' daughters shared, The lorn beholders into marble stared; Three dreadful fisters! down whose temples roll'd Their hair of fnakes in many a hissing fold, And feattering horror o'er the dreary strand, With fwarms of vipers fow'd the burning fand. Still to the fouth our pointed keels we guide, And through the Austral gulph still onward ride: Her palmy forests mingling with the skies, Leona's rugged steep behind us flies;

when mixed together they operate as an emetic, but when separate do not. They abound with great variety of fishes, and their banks are covered with horses, crocodiles, winged serpents, clephants, ounces, wild boars, with great numbers of others, wonderful for the variety of their nature and different forms. Faria y Sousa.

1 Tombetu, the mart of Mandinga gold, was greatly reforted to by the merchants of Grand Cairo, Tunis, Oran, Tremisen, Fez, Morocco, &c.

8 Contra hoc promontorium (Hesperionceras) Gorgades infulæ narrantur, Gorgonum quondam domus, bidui navigatione distantes a continente, ut tradit Xenophon Lampsacenus. Penetravit in eas Hanno Pœnorum imperator, prodiditque hirta fœminarum corpora viros pernicitate evalisse, duarumque Gorgonum cutes argumenti et mira-culi gratia in Junonis templo posuit, spec-tatas usque ad Carthaginem captam. Plin. Hist. Nat. 1. 6. c. 31.

The cape of palms that jutting land we name,
Already conscious of our nation's b fame.

Where the vext waves against our bulwarks roar,
And Lusian towers o'erlook the bending shore:
Our fails wide swelling to the constant blast,
Now by the isle from Thomas named we past;
And Congo's spacious realm before us rose,
Where copious Layra's limpid billow slows;
A flood by ancient hero never seen,
Where many a temple o'er the banks of spreen,
Rear'd by the Lusian heroes, through the night
Of Pagan darkness, pours the mental light.

Behind us now the northern ocean streams; Lower and lower still the Pole-star gleams, h During the reign of John II. the Portuguese crected several forts, and acquired great power in the extensive regions of Guinea. Azambuja, a Portuguese captain, having obtained leave from Caramansa, a Negro Prince, to erect a sort on his territories, an unlucky accident had almost proved fatal to the discoverers. A huge rock lay very commodious for a quarry; the workmen began on it; but this rock, as the Devil would have it, happened to be a Negro God. The Portuguese were driven away by the enraged worshippers, who were afterwards with difficulty pacified by a profusion of such presents as they most esteemed.

away by the chiaged worningpers, who were afterwards with difficulty pacified by a profusion of fuch presents as they most esteemed.

The Portuguese having brought an Ambassader from Congo to Lisbon sent him back instructed in the faith. By this means the King, Queen, and about 100,000 of the people were baptized; the idols were destroyed and churches built. Soon after the Prince, who was then absent at war, was baptized by the name of Alonzo. His younger brother, Aquitimo, however, would not receive the faith, and the father, because allowed only one wise, turned apostate, and left the crown to his Pagan son, who, with a great army, surrounded his brother, when only attended by some Portuguese and Christian Blacks, in all only thirty-seven. By the bravery of these, however, Aquitimo was deseated, taken, and sain. One of Aquitimo's officers declared, they were not deseated by the thirty-seven Christians, but by a glorious army who fought under a shining cross. The idols were again destroyed, and Alonzo sent his sons, grandsons, and nephews to Portugal to study; two of whom were afterwards bishops in Congo. Extracted from Faria y Sonsa.

Till past the limit, where the car of day Roll'd o'er our heads, and pour'd the downward ray: We now beheld Califto's ftar k retire Beneath the waves, unawed by Juno's ire. Here, while the Sun his polar journeys takes, His visit doubled, double seasons makes: Stern winter twice deforms the changeful year, And twice the spring's gay flowers their honours rear. Now pressing onward, past the burning zone, Another heaven to ancient times unknown. Its arch'd expanse of deeper azure shews; Before us now another Pole Star glows: Here gloomy night assumes a darker reign, And fewer stars inspire the heavenly plain; Fewer than those that gild the northern pole, And o'er our feas their glittering chariots roll: Full to the fouth a shining cross appears. Our heaving breafts the blifsful Omen cheers:

k According to fable, Calisto was a nymph of Diana. Jupiter having assumed the figure of that goddess, completed his amorous desires. On the discovery of her pregnancy Diana drove her from her train. She fled to the woods, where she was delivered of a son. Juno changed them into bears, and Jupiter placed them in heaven, where they form the constellation of Ursa major and minor. Juno still enraged, entreated Theis never to suffer Calisto to bathe in the sea. This is founded on the appearance of the northern pole-star, to the inhabitants of our hemisphere: but when Gama approached the austral pole, the northern, of consequence, disappeared under the waves.

¹ The constellation of the southern pole was called The Cross by the Portuguese failors,

from the appearance of that figure formed by feven stars, four of which are particularly luminous. Dante, who wrote before the discovery of the southern hemisphere, has these remarkable lines in the first canto of his Purgatorio.

I mi volfi a man destra, e posi mente All' altro polo, e vidi quattro stelle Non viste mai, suor ch' alla prima gente.

Voltaire somewhere observes, that this looked like a prophecy, when, in the succeeding age, these four stars were known to be near the Antartic pole. Dante, however, spoke allegorically of the four cardinal virtues.

allegorically of the four cardinal virtues.

In the fouthern hemisphere, as Camoens observes, the nights are darker than in the northern, the skies being adorned with much fewer stars.

Seven radiant stars compose the hallow'd sign
That rose still higher o'er the wavy brine.
Beneath this southern axle of the world
Never, with daring search, was stag unfurl'd;
Nor pilot knows if bounding shores are placed,
Or if one dreary sea o'erslow the lonely waste.

While thus our keels still onward boldly stray'd, Now tost by tempests, now by calms delay'd, To tell the terrors of the deep untry'd, What toils we fuffer'd, and what storms defy'd; What rattling deluges the black clouds pour'd, What dreary weeks of folid darkness lour'd; What mountain furges mountain furges lash'd, What sudden hurricanes the canvas dash'd; What bursting lightnings, with incessant flare, Kindled in one wide flame the burning air; What roaring thunders bellow'd o'er our head, And feem'd to shake the reeling ocean's bed: To tell each horror on the deep reveal'd, Would ask an iron throat with tenfold vigour " steel'd: Those dreadful wonders of the deep I saw, Which fill the failor's breast with sacred awe;

> Non, mili fi linguæ centum sunt, oraque centum, Ferrea vox, omnes scelcrum comprendere formas.

En. VI.

And which the fages, of their learning vain, Esteem the phantoms of the dreamful brain: That living fire, by fea-men held "divine, Of heaven's own care in storms the holy sign, Which midst the horrors of the tempest plays, And on the blast's dark wings will gaily blaze; Those eyes distinct have seen that living fire Glide through the storm, and round my fails aspire. And oft, while wonder thrill'd my breast, mine eyes To heaven have feen the watery columns rife. Slender at first the subtle fume appears, And writhing round and round its volume rears: Thick as a mast the vapour swells its size, A curling whirlwind lifts it to the skies; The tube now straitens, now in width extends, And in a hovering cloud its fummit ends: Still gulp on gulp it fucks the rifing tide, And now the cloud, with cumbrous weight fupply'd,

Of beaven's even care in florms the boly fign.

In the expedition of the Golden Fleece, in a violent tempest these fires were seen to hover over the heads of Castor and Pollux, who were two of the Argonauts, and a calm immediately ensued. After the apotheoses of these heroes, the Grecian sailors invoked these fires by the names of Castor and Pollux, or the sons of Jupiter. The Athenians called them Σωτηςιε, Saviours; and Homer, in his hymn to Castor and Pollux, says, Ναύταις σήματα καλά πόνε σφίσι», δι δὶ ἰδύντις Γήθησαν, πάυσαιτο δ΄ δίζυξοῖο πονοιο.

That living fire, by fea-men beld divine—Is thus accounted for in natural history. The fulphureous vapours of the air, after being violently agitated by a tempest, unite, and when the humidity begins to subside, as is the case when the storm is almost exhausted, by the agitation of their atoms they take fire, and are attracted by the mast and cordage of the ship. Being thus naturally the pledges of the approaching calm, it is no wonder that the superstition of sailors should in all ages have esteemed them divine, and

Full-gorged, and blackening, spreads, and moves, more flow, And waving trembles to the waves below. Thus when to shun the summer's sultry beam The thirsty heifer seeks the cooling stream, The eager horse-leech fixing on her lips, Her blood with ardent throat infatiate fips, Till the gorged glutton, fwell'd beyond her fize, Drops from her wounded hold, and bursting dies. So bursts the cloud, o'erloaded with its freight, And the dash'd ocean staggers with the weight. But fay, ye fages, who can weigh the cause, And trace the fecret springs of Nature's laws, Say, why the wave, of bitter brine erewhile, Should to the bosom of the deep recoil Robb'd of its falt, and from the cloud distill Sweet as the waters of the limpid orill? Ye fons of boastful wisdom, famed of yore, Whose feet unwearied wander'd many a shore, From Nature's wonders to withdraw the veil, Had you with me unfurl'd the daring fail, o In this book, particularly in the description of Massilia, the Gorgades, the fires called Castor and Pollux, and the waterspout, Camoens has happily imitated the manner of Lucan. It is probable that Camoens, in his voyage to the East-Indies, was an eye witness of the phanomena of the fires and water-spout. The latter is thus described by Pliny, l. 2. c. 5t. Fit et calizo, bellua similis nubes dira navigantibus vocatur et columna, cum spissatus bumor rigensque ipse se sustint, et in longam veluti sissulam nubes aquam trabit. When the violent heat attracts the waters to rise in the form of a tube, the marine salts are lest behind by the action of rarefaction, being too gross and fixed to ascend. It is thus, when the overloaded vapour bursts, that it descends

Squeet as the quaters of the limpid rill.

Had view'd the wondrous scenes mine eyes survey'd,
What sceming miracles the deep display'd,
What secret virtues various Nature shew'd,
Oh! heaven! with what a fire your page had glow'd!

BOOK V.

And now fince wandering o'er the foamy spray, Our brave Armada held her venturous way, Five times the changeful Empress of the night Had fill'd her shining horns with silver light, When fudden from the main-top's airy round Land, land, is ecchoed - At the joyful found, Swift to the crowded decks the bounding crew On wings of hope and fluttering transport flew, And each strain'd eye with aching fight explores The wide horizon of the eastern shores: As thin blue clouds the mountain fummits rife, And now the lawns falute our joyful eyes; Loud through the fleet the ecchoing shouts prevail, We drop the anchor, and reftrain the fail; And now descending in a spacious bay, Wide o'er the coast the venturous soldiers stray, To fpy the wonders of the spacious shore, Where stranger's foot had never trod before. I and my pilots on the yellow fand Explore beneath what sky the shores expand.

That fage device, whose wonderous use proclaims Th' immortal honour of its authors' p names, The Sun's height measured, and my compass scann'd, The painted globe of ocean and of land. Here we perceived our venturous keels had past Unharm'd the wintery tropick's howling blaft; And now approach'd dread Neptune's fecret reign, Where the stern Power, as o'er the frozen plain He rides, wide featters from the polar star Hail, ice, and fnow, and all the wintery war. While thus attentive on the beach we flood, My foldiers, hastening from the upland wood, Right to the shore a trembling Negro brought, Whom on the forest-height by force they caught, As diftant wander'd from the call of home, He fuck'd the honey from the porous comb. Horror glared in his look, and fear extreme In mein more wild than brutal Polypheme: No word of rich Arabia's tongue he knew, Nor fign could answer, nor our gems would view: From garments striped with shining gold he turn'd, The starry diamond and the filver spurn'd.

II. by two Jew Physicians, named Roderic and Joseph. It is afferted by some that they were assisted by Martin of Bohemia, a celebrated Mathematician. Partly from Castera. Vid. Barros, Dec. 1. l. 4. c. 2.

P That fage device — The Astrolabium, an instrument of infinite service in navigation, by which the altitude of the sun, and distance of the stars is taken. It was invented in Portugal during the reign of John

Strait at my nod are worthless trinkets brought;
Round beads of chrystal as a bracelet wrought,
A cap of red, and dangling on a string
Some little bells of brass before him ring:
A wide-mouth'd laugh confest his barbarous joy,
And both his hands he raised to grasp the toy.
Pleased with these gifts we set the savage free,
Homeward he springs away, and bounds with glee.

Soon as the gleamy streaks of purple morn The lofty forest's topmost boughs adorn, Down the steep mountain's side, yet hoar with dew, A naked crowd, and black as night their hue, Come tripping to the shore: Their wishful eyes Declare what tawdry trifles most they prize: These to their hopes were given, and, void of fear, Mild feem'd their manners, and their looks fincere. A bold rash youth, ambitious of the fame Of brave adventurer, Velose his name, Through pathless brakes their homeward steps attends, And on his fingle arm for help depends. Long was his stay: my earnest eyes explore, When rushing down the mountain to the shore I mark'd him; terror urged his rapid strides, And foon Coëllo's skiff the wave divides.

Yet ere his friends advanced, the treacherous foe
Trod on his latest steps, and aim'd the blow.
Moved by the danger of a youth so brave,
Myself now snatch'd an oar, and sprung to save:
When sudden, blackening down the mountain's height,
Another crowd pursued his panting slight;
And soon an arrowy and a flinty shower
Thick o'er our heads the sierce barbarians pour.
Nor pour'd in vain; a feather'd arrow stood
Fix'd in my leg, and drank the gushing blood.

9 Camoens, in describing the adventure of Fernando Veloso, by departing from the truth of history, has shewn his judgment as a Poet. The Place where the Portuguese landed they named the Bay of St. Helen. They caught one of two negroes, fays Faria, who were busied in gathering honey on a mountain. Their behaviour to this savage, whom they gratified with a red cap, some glasses and bells, induced him to bring a number of his companions for the like trifles. Though some who accompanied Gama were skilled in the various Ethiopic languages, not one of the natives could understand them. A commerce however was commenced by figns and gestures. Gama behaved to them with great civility; the fleet was chearfully supplied with fresh provisions, for which the natives received cloaths and trinkets. But this friendship was foon interrupted by a young rash Portuguese. Having contracted an intimacy with some of the negroes, he obtained leave to penetrate into the country along with them, to observe their habitations and strength. They conducted him to their huts with great good nature, and placed before him, what they esteemed an elegant repast, a sea-calf dressed in the way of their country. This so much disgusted the delicate Poituguese, that he instantly got up and abruptly left them. Nor did they oppose his departure, but accompanied him with the greatest innocence. As fear, how-ever is always jealous, he imagined they were leading him as a victim to flaughter. No fooner did he come near the ships, than he called aloud for affistance. Coëllo's boat immediately fet off for his rescue. The Ethiopians fled to the woods; and now esteening the Portuguese as a band of lawlefs plunderers, they provided themselves with arms, and lay in ambush. Their weapons were javelins, headed with short pieces of horn, which they throw with great dexterity. Soon after, while Gama and some of his officers were on the shore taking the altitude of the fun by the aftrolabium, they were fuddenly and with great fury attacked by the ambush from the weods. Several were much wounded, multos convulnerant, inter ques Gamain pede vulnus acces it, and Gama received a wound in the foot. The Admiral made a speedy retreat to the fleet, prudently chufing rather to leave the negroes the honour of the victory, than to risque the life of one man in a quarrel so foreign to the destination of his expedition, and where, to impress the terror of his arms could be of no service to his interest. When he came nearer to the East-Indies he acted in a different manner. He then made himself dreaded whenever the treachery of the natives provoked his resentment. Collected from Faria and Osorius.

Vengeance

Vengeance as sudden every wound repays,

Full on their fronts our flashing lightnings blaze;

Their shrieks of horror instant pierce the sky,

And wing'd with fear at fullest speed they fly.

Long tracks of gore their scatter'd flight betray'd,

And now Veloso to the fleet convey'd,

His sportful mates his brave exploits demand,

And what the curious wonders of the land:

- " Hard was the hill to climb, my valiant friend,
- "But oh! how fmooth and easy to descend!
- "Well hast thou proved thy swiftness for the chace,
- "And shewn thy matchless merit in the race!"
 With look unmoved the gallant youth reply'd,
- " For you, my friends, my fleetest speed was try'd;
- "'Twas you the fierce barbarians meant to flay;
- " For you I fear'd the fortune of the day;
- "Your danger great without mine aid I knew,
- " And ' fwift as lightning to your rescue flew."

The critics, particularly the French, have vehemently declaimed against the least mixture of the Comic, with the dignity of the Epic Poem. It is needless to enter into any desence of this passage of Camoens, farther than to observe, that Homer, Virgil, and Milton have offended the critics in the same manner, and that this piece of raillery in the Lusiadis by much the politest, and the least reprehensible of any thing of the kind in the sour Poets. In Homer are several strokes of low raillery. Patroclus having killed Hector's charioteer, puns thus on his sudden fall. "It is a pity be is not nearer the sea! He would soon catch abundance of D d oysters, nor would the storms frighten him. See how he dives from his chariot down to the fand! What excellent divers are the Trojans! Virgil, the most judicious of all Poets, descends even to burlesque, where the commander of a galley tumbles the Pilot into the sea:

Segnemque Menæten
In mare præcipitem puppi deturbat ab alta.
At grævis ut fundo vix tandem redditus imo eft
Jam fenior, madidaque fluens in vefte Menætet,
Sunma petit feopuli ficcaque in rupe refedit.
Illum et labentem Teueri, et rifere natantem;
Et falfos rident revomentem peelore fluelus.
And though the character of the speakers,

the ingenious defence which has been of-

He now the treason of the foe relates,

How soon, as past the mountain's upland straits,

They changed the colour of their friendly shew,

And force forbade his steps to tread below:

How down the coverts of the steepy brake

Their lurking stand a treacherous ambush take;

On us, when speeding to defend his slight,

To rush, and plunge us in the shades of night:

Nor while in friendship would their lips unfold

Where India's ocean laved the orient shores of gold.

Now prosp'rous gales the bending canvas swell'd;
From these rude shores our fearless course we held:
Beneath the glistening wave the God of day
Had now five times withdrawn the parting ray,
When o'er the prow a sudden darkness spread,
And slowly floating o'er the mast's tall head
A black cloud hover'd: nor appear'd from far
The moon's pale glimpse, nor faintly twinkling star;
So deep a gloom the louring vapour cast,
Transfixt with awe the bravest stood aghast.

fered for Milton, may, in fome measure, vindicate the raillery which he puts into the mouths of Satan and Belial, the lowness of it, when compared with that of Camoens, must still be acknowledged. Talking of the execution of the diabolical artillery among the good angels, they, says Satan, Flew off, and into strange vagaries fell

As they would dance, yet for a dance they feem'd Somewhat extravagant and wild, perhaps For joy of offer'd peace.—
To whom thus Belial, in like gamefome mood, Leader, the terms we fent were terms of weight, Of hard contents, and full of force urg'd home, Such as we might perceive amus'd them all, And flumbled many—this gift they have befide,

They thew us when our faces walk not upright.

Meanwhile

fors

Meanwhile a hollow bursting roar resounds,
As when hoarse surges lash their rocky mounds;
Nor had the blackening wave, nor frowning heaven
The wonted signs of gathering tempest given.
Amazed we stood—O thou, our fortune's guide,
Avert this Omen, mighty God,—I cried;
Or through forbidden climes adventrous stray'd,
Have we the secrets of the deep survey'd,
Which these wide solitudes of seas and sky
Were doom'd to hide from man's unhallow'd eye?
Whate'er this prodigy, it threatens more
Than midnight tempests and the mingled roar,
When sea and sky combine to rock the marble shore.

1

I spoke, when rising through the darken'd air,
Appall'd we saw an hideous Phantom glare;
High and enormous o'er the flood he tower'd,
And thwart our way with sullen aspect lour'd:
An earthy paleness o'er his cheeks was spread,
Erect uprose his hairs of wither'd red;
Writhing to speak his sable lips disclose,
Sharp and disjoin'd, his gnashing teeth's blue rows;
His haggard beard slow'd quivering on the wind,
Revenge and horror in his mien combined;
His clouded front, by withering lightnings scared,
The inward anguish of his soul declared,

His red eyes glowing from their dusky caves
Shot livid fires: Far ecchoing o'er the waves
His voice resounded, as the cavern'd shore
With hollow groan repeats the tempest's roar.
Cold gliding horrors thrill'd each hero's breast,
Our bristling hairs and tottering knees confest
Wild dread, the while with visage ghastly wan,
His black lips trembling, thus the fiend began:

5 The partiality of Translators and Editors is become almost proverbial. The admiration of their author is supposed when they undertake to introduce him to the public; that admiration therefore, may without a blush be consessed; but if the reputation of judgment is valued, all the jealoufy of circumspection is necessary, for the transition from admiration to partiality and hypercriticism is not only easy, but to oneself often imperceptible. Yet however guarded against this partiality of hypercriticism the Tranflator of Camcens may deem himself, he is aware that some of his colder readers, may perhaps, in the following instance accuse him of it. Regardless however of the sang froid of those who judge by authority and not by their own feelings, he will venture to appeal to the few whose taste, though formed by the classics, is untainted with classical prejudices. To these he will appeal, and to these he will venture the affertion, that the fiction of the apparition of the Cape of Tempests, in sublimity and awful grandeur of imagination, stands unsurpassed in human composition. -- Voltaire, and the foreign Critics, have confessed its merit. -In the prodigy of the Harpies in the Æneid, neither the

Virginei volucrum vultus, fa dissimi ventris Proluvies, uncaçue manus, et pallida semper Ora same:

Though Virgil, to heighten the description, introduces it with

Pestis es ira Deûm Stygiis sese extulit undis:

Nor the predictions of the harpy Celeno, can, in point of dignity, bear any comparison with the siction of Camoens. The noble and admired description of Fame, in the fourth Æneid, may seem indeed to challenge competition:

Fama, malum quo non aliud velocius ullum:
Mobilitate viget, viresque atquirit eundo:
Parva metu primò; mox sese attollit in auras,
Ingrediturque solo, & caput inter nubila condit:
Illam Terra parens, ira irritata Deorum,
Extremam (ut perbibent) Cœo Enceladoque sororem
Progenuit; pedibus celerem et pernicibus alis:
Monstrum borrendum, ingens; cui quot sunt corpore

Tot vigiles oculi subter (mirabile dietu)
Tot linguae, totidem ora sonant, tot subrigit aures.
Noste volat caeli medio terraque, per umbram
Stridens, nee dulei declinat lumina somno s
Luce sedet custos, aut summi culmine teeti,
Turribus aut aliis, et magnus territat urbes.

Fame, the great ill, from small beginnings grows; Swist from the first, and every moment brings New vigour to her slights, new pinions to her

Soon grows the Pigmy to gigantic fize,
Her feet on earth, her forehead in the skies:
Enraged against the Gods, revengeful Earth
Produced her last of the Titanian buth.
Swift in her walk, more switt her winged haste,
A monstrous phantom, horrible and vast;
As many plumes as raise her losty flight,
So many piercing eyes enlarge her fight:
Millions of opening mouths to Fame belong,
And every mouth is surnish'd with a tongue,
And round with listning ears the flying plague
is hung:

is hung;
She fills the peaceful universe with cries,
No slumbers ever close her wakeful eyes:
By day from losty towers her head she shews.

DRYD.

O you, the boldest of the nations, fired
By daring pride, by lust of fame inspired,
Who scornful of the bowers of sweet repose,
Through these my waves advance your daring prows,
Regardless of the lengthening watery way,
And all the storms that own my sovereign sway,
Who mid surrounding rocks and shelves explore
Where never hero braved my rage before;
Ye sons of Lusus, who with eyes profane
Have view'd the secrets of my awful reign,
Have pass'd the bounds which jealous Nature drew
To veil her secret shrine from mortal view;

The Mobilitate viget, the Vires acquirit eundo, the Parva metu primo, &c. the Caput inter nubila condit, the plumæ, oculi lingue, ora, and aures, the Nette velat, the Luce fedet cuftos, and the Magnas territat urbes, are all very great, and finely imagined. But the whole picture is the off-fpring of careful attention and judgment; it is a noble display of the calm majesty of Virgil, but it has not the enthusiasm of that heat of spontaneous conception, which the ancients honoured with the name of infpiration. The fiction of Camoens, on the contrary, is the genuine effusion of the glow of poetical imagination. The description of the spectre, the awfulness of the prediction, and the horror that breathes through the whole, till the phantom is interrupted by Gama, are in the true spirit of the wild and grand terrific of an Homer, or a Shakespeare. But however Camoens may, in this passage, have excelled Virgil, he himself is infinitely surpassed by two passages of Holy Writ. "A thing was secretly brought to me," says the Author of the book of Job, " and mine ear received a little thereof. In though:s from the visions of the night, when deep sleep falletb on men, fear came upon me and trembling, which made all my bones to shake: then a spirit passed before my face; the hair of my steps stood up: It stood still, but I could not dif ern the form thereof: an image was before mine eyes, there was silence, and I heard a woice: Shall mortal man be more just than God! shall a man be more pure than his Maker! Behold he put no trust in his servants, and his angels he charged with felly: how much less them that dwell in houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust, and who are crushed before the moth!

This whole passage, particularly the indistinguishable form and the silence, are as superior to Camoens in the inimitably wild terrific, as the following, from the Apocalypse, is in grandeur of description. "And I saw another mighty angel come down from beaven, cloathed with a cloud, and arainhowwwas upon his head, his face was as it were the sun, and his feet as pillars of sire ... and he set his right soot upon the sea, and his lest soot upon the carth, and cried with a loud voice, as when a lion reareth ... and be listed up his hant to beaven, and sware by Him that liveth for ever and ever, ... that Time should be no more.

Hear from my lips what direful woes attend, And bursting foon shall o'er your race descend.

With every bounding keel that dares my rage,
Eternal war my rocks and storms shall wage,
The next proud sleet that through my drear 'domain,
With daring search shall hoist the streaming vane,
That gallant navy by my whirlwinds tost,
And raging seas shall perish on my coast:
Then He who first my secret reign descried
A naked corse wide sloating o'er the tide
Shall drive—Unless my heart's full raptures fail,
O Lusus! oft shalt thou thy children wail;
Each year thy shipwreck'd sons shalt thou deplore,
Each year thy sheeted masts shall strew my shore.

With trophies plumed behold an Hero come', Ye dreary wilds, prepare his yawning tomb.

of Gama to Portugal, a fleet of thirteen fail, under the command of Pedro Alvarez Cabral, was fent out on the fecond voyage to India, where the admiral with only fix ships arrived. The rest were mostly destroyed by a terrible tempest at the Cape of Good Hope, which lasted twenty days. The day-time, says Faria, was so dark that the sailors could scarcely see each other, or hear what was said for the horrid noise of the winds. Among those who perished was the celebrated Bartholemew Diaz, who was the first modern discoverer of the Cape of Good Hope, which he named the Cape of Tempests.

pests.

Beheld an hero come—Don Francisco de Almerda. He was the first Portuguese viceroy of India, in which country he obtained feveral great victories over the Mohammedans and Pagans. He was the first who conquered Quiloa and Mombassa or Mombase. On his return to Portugal he put into the bay of Saldanna, near the Cape of Good Hope, to take in water and provisions. The rudeness of one of his servants produced a quarrel with the Caffres, or Hottentots. His attendants, much against his will, forced him to march against the blacks. "Ah, whither (he exclaimed) "will you carry the infirm man of fixty "years." After plundering a miserable village, on the return to their ships they were attacked by a superior number of Caffres, who sought with such sury in rescue of their children, whom the Portuguese had seized, that the viceroy and sifty of his attendants were slain.

Though

Though fmiling fortune bleft his youthful morn,
Though glory's rays his laurel'd brows adorn,
Full oft though he beheld with fparkling eye
The Turkish moons in wild confusion fly,
While he, proud victor, thunder'd in the rear,
All, all his mighty fame shall vanish here.
Quiloa's sons, and thine Mombaze, shall see
Their conqueror bend his laurel'd head to me;
While proudly mingling with the tempest's sound,
Their shouts of joy from every cliff rebound.

The howling blaft, ye slumbering storms prepare, A youthful Lover and his beauteous Fair, Triumphant fail from India's ravaged land; His evil angel leads him to my strand. Through the torn hulk the dashing waves shall roar, The shatter'd wrecks shall blacken all my shore. Themselves escaped, despoil'd by savage hands, Shall naked wander o'er the burning fands, Spared by the waves far deeper woes to bear, Woes even by me acknowledged with a tear. Their infant race, the promised heirs of joy, Shall now no more an hundred hands employ; By cruel want, beneath the parents' eye, In these wide wastes their infant race shall die; Through dreary wilds where never Pilgrim trod, Where caverns yawn and rocky fragments nod,

The hapless Lover and his Bride shall stray,
By night unshelter'd, and forlorn by day.
In vain the Lover o'er the trackless plain
Shall dart his eyes, and cheer his spouse in vain.
Her tender limbs, and breast of mountain snow,
Where ne'er before intruding blast might blow,
Parch'd by the sun, and shrivell'd by the cold
Of dewy night, shall he, fond man, behold.
Thus wand'ring wide, a thousand ills o'erpast,
In fond embraces they shall sink at last;
While pitying tears their dying eyes o'erslow,
And the last sigh shall wail each other's "woe.

" This poetical description of the miserable catastrophe of Don Emmanuel de Souza, and his beautiful spouse Leonora de Sà, is by no means exaggerated. He was several years governor of Diu in India, where he amassed immense wealth. On his return to his native country, the ship in which was his lady, all his riches, and five hundred men, his failors and domestics, was dashed to pieces on the rocks at the Cape of Good Hope. Don Emmanuel, his lady, and three children, with four hundred of the crew escaped, having only faved a few arms and provisions. As they marched through the wild uncultivated deferts, fome died of famine, of thirft, and fatigue; others, who wandered from the main body in fearch of water, were murdered by the favages, or destroyed by the wild beasts. They arrived at last at a village inhabited by Ethiopian banditti. At first they were courteously received, but the barbarians, having unexpectedly seized their arms, stripped the whole company naked, and lest them destitute to the mercy of the defert. The wretchedness of the delicate and exposed Leonora was encreased by the brutal infults of the negroes. Her husband, unable 'to relieve, beheld her miseries. After having travelled about 300 leagues, her legs swelled, her seet bleeding at every step, and her strength exhausted, she sunk down, and with the sand covered herself to the neck, to conceal her nakedness. In this dreadful situation, she beheld two of her children expire. Her own death soon followed. Her husband, who had been long enamoured of her beauty, received her last breath in a distracted embrace. Immediately he snatched his third child in his arms, and uttering the most lamentable cries, he ran into the thickest of the wood, where the wild beasts were foon heard to growl over their prey. Of the whole sour hundred who escaped the waves, only six and twenty arrived at another Ethiopian village, whose inhabitants were more civilized, and traded with the merchants of the Red sea, from whence they sound a passage to Europe, and brought the tidings of the unhappy fate of their companions. Jerome de Cortercal, a Portuguese poet, has written an affecting poem on the shipwreck and deplorable catastrophe of Don Emmanuel and his beloved spouse. Partly from Castera.

Some few, the fad companions of their fate, Shall yet furvive, protected by my hate, On Tagus' banks the difmal tale to tell How blafted by my frown your heroes fell.

He paus'd, in act still farther to disclose A long, a dreary prophecy of woes: When fpringing onward, loud my voice refounds, And midst his rage the threatening Shade confounds. What art thou, Horrid Form, that ridest the air? By heaven's eternal light, stern Fiend, declare. His lips he writhes, his eyes far round he throws, And from his breast deep hollow groans arose, Sternly askaunce he stood: with wounded pride And anguish torn, In me, behold, he cried, While dark-red sparkles from his eyeballs roll'd, In me the Spirit of the Cape behold, That rock by you the Cape of Tempests named, By Neptune's rage in horrid earthquakes framed, When Jove's red bolts o'er Titan's offspring flamed. With wide-stretch'd piles I guard the pathless strand, And Afric's fouthern mound unmoved I stand: Nor Roman prow, nor daring Tyrian oar Ere dash'd the white wave foaming to my shore; Nor Greece nor Carthage ever spread the fail On these my seas to catch the trading gale.

212 222

You, you alone have dared to plough my main, And with the human voice disturb my lonesome reign.

Sprung from th' embrace of Titan and of Earth, The hundred-handed giant at a birth, And Me the rock-ribb'd mother gave to fame, Great Adamastor then my dreaded name. In my bold brothers' glorious hopes engaged, Tremendous war against the gods I waged: Yet not to reach the throne of heaven I try, With mountain piled on mountain to the sky; To me the conquest of the seas befel, In his green realm the fecond Jove to quell. Nor did ambition all my passions hold, 'Twas love that prompted an attempt fo bold. Ah me, one summer in the cool of day I faw the Nereids on the fandy bay With lovely Thetis from the wave advance In mirthful frolic, and the naked dance. In all her charms reveal'd the goddess trode, With fiercest fires my struggling bosom glow'd; Yet, yet I feel them burning in my heart, And hopeless languish with the raging smart. For her, each goddess of the heavens I scorn'd, For her alone my fervent ardour burn'd.

In vain I woo'd her to the lover's bed, From my grim form with horror mute she fled. Madning with love, by force I ween to gain The filver goddess of the blue domain: To the hoar mother of the Nereid * band I tell my purpose, and her aid command: By fear impell'd, old Doris tries to move, And win the spouse of Peleus to my love. The filver goddess with a smile replies, What nymph can yield her charms a giant's prize! Yet from the horrors of a war to fave, And guard in peace our empire of the wave, Whate'er with honour he may hope to gain, That let him hope his wish shall soon attain. The promifed grace infused a bolder fire, And shook my mighty limbs with fierce defire. But ah, what error fpreads its dreamful night, What phantoms hover o'er the lover's fight! The war refign'd, my steps by Doris led, While gentle eve her fhadowy mantle spread, Before my steps the snowy Thetis shone In all her charms, all naked, and alone.

Doris, the bitterness or falt, the supposed cause of its prolific quality in the generation of fishes.

w Doris, the fifter and fpouse of Nereus, and mother of the Nereides. By Nereus, in the physical sense of the fable, is understood the water of the sea, and by Swift as the wind with open arms I sprung, And round her waist with joy delirious clung: In all the transports of the warm embrace, An hundred kiffes on her angel face, On all its various charms my rage bestows, And on her cheek my cheek enraptured glows. When, oh, what anguish while my shame I tell! What fixt despair, what rage my bosom swell! Here was no goddess, here no heavenly charms, A rugged mountain fill'd my eager arms, Whose rocky top o'erhung with matted brier, Received the kisses of my amourous fire. Waked from my dream cold horror freezed my blood; Fixt as a rock before the rock I flood; O fairest goddess of the ocean train, Behold the triumph of thy proud disdain; Yet why, I cried, with all I wish'd decoy, And when exulting in the dream of joy, An horrid mountain to mine arms convey !--Madning I spoke, and furious sprung away. Far to the fouthI fought the world unknown, Where I unheard, unscorn'd, might wail alone, My foul dishonour, and my tears to hide, And shun the triumph of the goddess' pride. My brothers now by Jove's red arm o'erthrown, Beneath huge mountains piled on mountains groan;

And

And I, who taught each eccho to deplore,
And tell my forrows to the defert shore,
I felt the hand of Jove my crimes pursue,
My stiffening slesh to earthy ridges grew,
And my huge bones, no more by marrow warm'd,
To horrid piles and ribs of rock transform'd,
Yon dark-brow'd cape of monstrous size became,
Where round me still, in triumph o'er my shame,
The silvery Thetis bids her surges roar,
And wast my groans along the dreary shore.

He fpoke, and deep a lengthen'd figh he drew,
A doleful found, and vanish'd from the view;
The frighten'd billows gave a rolling swell,
And distant far prolong'd the dismal yell;
Faint and more faint the howling ecchoes die,
And the black cloud dispersing leaves the *sky.

* The circumstances of the disappearance of the spectre are in the same poetical spirit of the introduction. If we may be allowed to allegorise the amour of Adamastor, it will be found a necessary part of the section, and, at any rate, to suppose the spectre the Spirit of that huge promontory the Cape of Tempests, which by night makes its awful appearance to the seet of Gama, while wandering in an unknown ocean, is a noble slight of imagination; nor need one struple to affirm, that the deception of the lover, and the metamorphosis, are in the best manner of Ovid. As already observed in the presace, the poem of Camoens is often allegorical: To establish Christianity in the East, is expresly said in the Lusiad to be the great purpose of the Hero. By Bacchus, the demon who oppofes the expedition, must, of consequence, be meant the genius of Mohammedism: and accordingly in the eighth book, the Evil Spirit and Bacchus are mentioned as the same perfonage; where, in the figure of Mohammed, he appears in a dream to a Mohammedan priest. In like manner by Adamastor, the genius of Mohammedism must be supposed to be meant. The Moors, who professed that religion, till the arrival of Gama, were the fole navigators of the eastern seas, and by every exertion of force and fraud they endeavoured to prevent the settlements of the Christians. In the figure of the spectre, the French translator finds an exact description of the person of Mohammed, his sierce demeanour and pale complexion, but he certainly carries his unravelment too far in several instances: High to the angel host, whose guardian care

Had ever round us watch'd, my hands I rear,
And heaven's dread king implore, As o'er our head
The siend dissolved, an empty shadow sled;
So may his curses by the winds of heaven
Far o'er the deep, their idle sport, be driven!

Now from the wave the chariot of the day
Whirl'd by the fiery courfers fprings away,
When full in view the giant Cape appears,
Wide fpreads its limbs, and high its shoulders rears;
Behind us now it curves the bending side,
And our bold vessels plow the eastern tide.
Nor long excursive off at sea we stand,
A cultured shore invites us to the land.
Here their sweet scenes the rural joys bestow,
And give our wearied minds a lively 'glow.

flances: to mention only two; "Mohammed (fays he) was a false prophet, so is Adamastor, who says Emmanuel de Souza and his spouse shall die in one another's arms, whereas, the husband was devoured by wild beasts in the wood. . . By the metamorphosis of Adamastor into an huge mass of earth and rock, laved by the waves, is meant the death and tomb of Mohammed. He died of a dropsy, behold the waters which surround him; woi a les eaux qui Péntourent.—His tomb was exceeding high, behold the height of the promontory." By such latitude of interpretation, the allegory which was really intended by an author, becomes suspected by the reader. As Camoens, however, has assured us that he did allegorise, one need not hesitate to affirm, that the amour of Adamastor is an instance of it. By Thetis is sigured Renown, or true Glory, by the sierce passion of the giant, the sierce rage of ambition, and by the rugged mountain that silled his deluded arms, the insamy acquired by the brutal conqueror Mohammed. The hint of this last circumstance is adopted from Castera.

And give our avearied minds a lively glow.—Variety is no less delightful to the reader than to the traveller, and the imagination of Camoens gave an abundant supply. The infertion of this pastoral landscape, between the terrific scenes which precede and sollow, has a fine effect. "Va-" riety," says Pope, in one of his notes on

The tenants of the coast, a festive band, With dances meet us on the yellow fand; Their brides on flow-paced oxen rode behind: The spreading horns with flowery garlands twined, Bespoke the dew-lapt beeves their proudest boast, Of all their bestial store the valued most. By turns the husbands and the brides prolong The various measures of the rural song. Now to the dance the rustic reeds resound; The dancers' heels light-quivering beat the ground, And now the lambs around them bleating stray, Feed from their hands, or round them frisking play. Methought I saw the sylvan reign of Pan, And heard the music of the Mantuan swan: With fmiles we hail them, and with joy behold The blissful manners of the age of gold. With that mild kindness, by their looks display'd, Fresh stores they bring, with cloth of red repay'd:

the Odyssey, "gives life and delight; and "it is much more necessary in epic than in "comic or tragic poetry, sometimes to shift the scenes to diversify and embellish the state of the fecnes to diversify and embellish the state of the stat

" fentir quelque ebose de charmes de l'Odysbee, et de la magnissence de l'Eneide." i. e.
The Portuguese failing upon the Atlantic ocean discovered the most southern point of Africa: here they found an immense sea, which carried them to the East Indies. The dangers they encountered in the voyage, the discovery of Mozambic, of Melinda, and of Calecut, have been sung by Camoens, whose poem recalls to our minds the charms of the Odyssey, and the magnificence of the Eneid. Montesquieu, Spirit of Laws, b. xxi. c. 21.

Yet from their lips no word we knew could flow, No fign of India's strand their hands bestow. Fair blow the winds; again with fails unfurl'd We dare the main, and feek the eastern world. Now round black Afric's coast our navy veer'd, And to the world's mid circle northward steer'd: The fouthern pole low to the wave declined, We leave the isle of Holy Cross a behind; That isle where erst a Lusian, when he past The tempest-beaten cape, his anchors cast, And own'd his proud ambition to explore The kingdoms of the morn could dare no more. From thence, still on, our daring course we hold Through trackless gulphs, whose billows never roll'd Around the vessel's pitchy sides before; Through trackless gulphs, where mountain surges roar, For many a night, when not a star appear'd, Nor infant moon's dim horns the darkness cheer'd; For many a dreary night, and cheerless day, In calms now fetter'd, now the whirlwind's play, By ardent hope still fired, we forced our dreadful way. Now fmooth as glass the shining waters lie, No cloud flow moving fails the azure fky;

² A fmall island, named Santa Cruz by Bartholomew Diaz, who dif overed it. According to Faria y Saufa, he went twenty-five leagues further, to the river del Infante, which, till past by Gama, was the utmost extent of the Portuguese discoveries.

Slack from their height the fails unmoved decline, The airy streamers form the downward line; No gentle quiver owns the gentle gale, Nor gentlest swell distends the ready fail; Fixt as in ice the flumbering prows remain, And filence wide extends her folemn reign. Now to the waves the burfting clouds descend, And heaven and fea in meeting tempests blend; The black-wing'd whirlwinds o'er the ocean fweep, And from his bottom roars the staggering deep. Driven by the yelling blast's impetuous sway Staggering we bound, yet onward bound away: And now escaped the fury of the storm, New danger threatens in a various form; Though fresh the breeze the swelling canvas swell'd, A current's headlong fweep our prows withheld: The rapid force imprest on every keel, Backward, o'erpower'd, our rolling vessels reel: When from their fouthern caves the winds, enraged In horrid conflict with the waves engaged; Beneath the tempest groans each loaded mast, And o'er the rushing tide our bounding navy b past.

of a tempest. The seasons, when these seas are safely navigable, are now perfectly known.

b It was the force of this rushing current which retarded the further discoveries of Diaz. Gama got over it by the affistance

Now shined the sacred morn, when from the East
Three kings the holy cradled Babe addrest,
And hail'd him Lord of heaven: that festive day
We dropt our anchors in an opening bay;
The river from the sacred day we name,
And stores, the wandering seaman's right, we claim:
Stores we received; our dearest hope in vain,
No word they utter'd could our ears retain;
Nought to reward our search for India's sound,
By word or sign our ardent wishes crown'd.

Behold, O King, how many a shore we try'd!

How many a sierce barbarian's rage defy'd!

Yet still in vain for India's shores we try,

The long-sought shores our daring search defy.

Beneath new heavens, where not a star we knew,

Through changing climes, where poison'd air we drew;

Wandering new seas, in gulphs unknown, forlorn,

By labour weaken'd, and by famine worn;

Our food corrupted, pregnant with disease,

And pestilence on each expected breeze;

Infelix! cui se exisio fortona referenat?
Septima post Trojæ excidium jum wertetur æstas;
Cum freta, cum terras omnes, sot inhospita saxa:
Sideraque emensæ serimur: dum per mare magnum
Italiam sequimur sugientem, et volvimur undis.

c The frequent disappointments of the Portuguese, when they expect to hear some account of India, is a judicious imitation of several parts of Virgil; who, in the same manner, magnifies the distresses of the Trojans in their search for the sated seat of Empire:

Not even a gleam of hope's delusive ray To lead us onward through the devious way: That kind delution which full oft has cheer'd The bravest minds, till glad success appear'd Worn as we were each night with hopeless care, Each day with danger that increased despair; Oh! Monarch, judge, what less than Lusian fire Could still the daring scorn of fate inspire! What less, O King, than Lusian faith withstand, When dire despair and famine gave command Their chief to murder, and with lawless power Sweep Afric's feas, and every coast devour! What more than Men in wild despair still bold! These more than Men in these my band behold! Sacred to death, by death alone fubdued, These all the rage of fierce despair 4 withstood;

d It had been extremely impolitic in Gama to mention the mutiny of his followers to the king Melinda. The boast of their loyalty besides, has a good effect in the poem, as it elevates the heroes, and gives uniformity to the character of bravery, which the dignity of the Epopea required to be ascribed to them. History relates the matter differently. In standing for the Cape of Good Hope, Gama gave the highest proofs of his resolution, "In illo aucem cursu valdé Game virtus enituit." The sleet seemed now tossed to the clouds, ut modo nubes contingere, and now sunk to the lowest whirlpools of the abyss. The winds were unsufferably cold, and to the rage of the tempest was added the horror of an almost continual darkness. The crew expected every moment to be swallowed up in the deep. At every interval of the storm, they came round Gama, afferting the impossibility to proceed further, and imploring to return. This he resolutely refused. A confpiracy against his life was formed, but was discovered by his brother. He guarded against it with the greatest courage and prudence. he put all the pilots in chains, and he himself, with some others, took the management of the helms. At last, after having many days withstood the tempess, and a persidious combination, invitae animo, with an unconquered mind, a savourable change of weather revived the spirits of the sleet, and allowed them to double the Cape of Good Hope. Extr. from Osor.

Firm to their faith, though fondest hope no more Could give the promise of their native shore!

Now the fweet waters of the stream we leave. And the falt waves our gliding ships receive: Here to the left, between the bending shores, Torn by the winds the whirling billow roars: And boiling raves against the founding coast. Whose mines of gold Sofala's merchants boast: Full to the gulph the showery fouth-winds howl, Aslant against the wind our vessels rowl: Far from the land, wide o'er the ocean driven. Our helms refigning to the care of heaven, By hope and fear's keen passion tost, we roam, When our glad eyes beheld the furges foam Against the beacons of a cultured bay, Where floops and barges cut the watery way. The river's opening breast some upward ply'd, And fome came gliding down the fweepy tide. Quick throbs of transport heaved in every heart To view the knowledge of the feaman's art; For here we hoped our ardent wish to gain, To hear of India's strand, nor hoped in vain. Though Ethiopia's fable hue they bore No look of wild furprize the natives wore:

Wide o'er their heads the cotton turban fwell'd, And cloth of blue the decent loins conceal'd. Their speech, though rude and dissonant of sound, Their speech a mixture of Arabian own'd. Fernando, skill'd in all the copious store. Of fair Arabia's speech and flowery lore, In joyful converse heard the pleasing tale, That o'er these seas full oft the frequent sail, And lordly vessels, tall as ours, appear'd, Which to the regions of the morning steer'd, And back returning to the fouthmost land, Convey'd the treasures of the Indian strand; Whose chearful crews, resembling ours, display The kindred face and colour of the day. Elate with joy we raise the glad acclaim, And, f River of good figns, the port we name: Then, facred to the angel guide, who led The young Tobiah to the spousal bed, And fafe return'd' him through the perilous way, We rear a column on the friendly 8 bay.

e When Gama arrived in the East, a confiderable commerce was carried on between the Indies and the Red Sea by the Moorish traders, by whom the gold mines of Sosala, and the riches of the oriental or Ethiopic coast of Africa were enjoyed. The traffic of the East was by land brought to Grand Cairo, from whence Europe was supplied by the Venetian and Antwerpian merchants.

1 Rio dos bons sinais.

It was the custom of the Portuguese navigators to creek crosses on the shores of the new-discovered countries. Gama carried materials for pillars of stone along with him, and erected fix of these crosses during his expedition. They bore the name and arms of the king of Portugal, and were intended as proofs of the title which accrues from the first discovery.

Our keels, that now had steer'd through many a clime, By shell-fish roughen'd, and incased with slime, Joyful we clean, while bleating from the field The fleecy dams the smiling natives yield: But while each face an honest welcome shews, And big with sprightly hope each bosom glows, (Alas! how vain the bloom of human joy! How foon the blafts of woe that bloom destroy!) A dread difease its rankling horrors shed, And death's dire ravage through mine army spread. Never mine eyes fuch dreary fight beheld, Ghastly the mouth and gums enormous h swell'd; And instant, putrid like a dead man's wound, Poisoned with fætid streams the air around. No fage phyfician's ever-watchful zeal, No skilful surgeon's gentle hand to heal, Were found: each dreary mournful hour we gave Some brave companion to a foreign grave. A grave, the awful gift of every shore! Alas! what weary toils with us they bore! Long, long endear'd by fellowship in woe, O'er their cold dust we give the tears to flow; times really happens in the course of a long voyage.

h This poetical description of the Seurvy is by no means exaggerated above what some-

And in their hapless lot forbode our own, A foreign burial, and a grave unknown!

Now deeply yearning o'er our deathful fate, With joyful hope of India's shore elate, We loofe the haulfers and the fail expand, And upward coast the Ethiopian strand. What danger threaten'd at Quiloa's isle, Mozambic's treason, and Mombassa's guile; What miracles kind heaven our guardian wrought, Loud Fame already to thine ears has brought: Kind heaven again that guardian care display'd, And to thy port our weary fleet convey'd, Where thou, O king, heaven's regent power below, Bidst thy full bounty and thy truth to flow; Health to the fick, and to the weary rest, And joyful hope revived in every breaft, Proclaim thy gifts, with grateful joy repay'd, The brave Man's tribute for the brave Man's aid. And now in honour of thy fond command, The glorious annals of my native land; And what the perils of a rout fo bold, So dread as ours, my faithful lips have told. Then judge, great Monarch, if the world before Ere faw the prow fuch length of feas explore!

Nor fage Ulysses, nor the Trojan pride Such raging gulphs, such whirling storms defy'd; Nor one poor tenth of my dread course explored, Though by the Muse as demigods adored.

O thou whose breast all Helicon inflamed, Whose birth seven vaunting cities proudly claim'd: And thou whose mellow lute and rural fong, In foftest flow, led Mincio's waves along. Whose warlike numbers as a storm impell'd, And Tyber's furges o'er his borders fwell'd: Let all Parnassus lend creative fire. And all the Nine with all their warmth inspire; Your demigod's conduct through every scene Cold fear can paint, or wildest fancy feign; The Syren's guileful lay, dire Circe's spell, And all the horrors of the Cyclop's cell: Bid Scylla's barking waves their mates o'erwhelm, And hurl the guardian Pilot from the ' helm, Give fails and oars to fly the purple shore, Where love of absent friend awakes no k more.

(Thence call'd Lotophagi) which whose taftes, Insatiate riots in the sweet repasts, Nor other home, nor other care intends, But quits his house, his country, and his friends: The three we sent, from off th' inchanting ground We dragg'd resultant, and by force we bound: The rest in haste forsook the pleasing shore, Or, the charm tasted, had return'd no more.

Pope, Odys. ix.

i See En. V. 833.
k The Lotophagi, fo named from the plant Lotus, are thus described by Homer.

Not prone to ill, nor firange to foreign guest, They eat, they drink, and Nature gives the feaft; The trees around them all their fruit produce; Lotos the name; divine, nestareous juice;

In all their charms display Calypso's smiles,

Her slowery arbours and her amorous wiles;

In skins confined the blustering winds 'controul,

Or o'er the feast bid loathsome harpies " prowl;

And lead your heroes through the dread abodes

Of tortured spectres and infernal "gods;

Give every flower that decks Aonia's hill

To grace your fables with divinest skill;

Beneath the wonders of my tale they fall,

Where truth all unadorn'd and pure exceeds them all.

While thus illustrious Gama charm'd their ears,
The look of wonder each Melindian wears,
And pleased attention witness'd the command
Of every movement of his lips or hand.
The king enraptured own'd the glorious same
Of Lisbon's monarchs, and the Lusian name;

The natural history of the Lotos, however, is very different. There are various kinds of it. The Lybian Lotos is a shrub like a bramble, the berries like the myrtle, but purple when ripe, and about the bigness of an olive. Mixed with breadcorn it was used as sood for slaves. They also made an agreeable wine of it, but which would not keep above ten days. See Pope's note in loco.

In skins confin'd the blustering winds controul — The gift of Bolus to Ulysses.

The adverse winds in leathern bags he brac'd, Compress'd their force, and lock'd each struggling blast:

For him the mighty fire of gods affign'd, The tempest's lord, the tyrant of the wind; His word alone the list'ning storms obey,
To smooth the deep, or swell the soamy sea.
These in my hollow ship the monarch hung,
Securely setter'd by a silver thong;
But Zephyrus exempt, with friendly gales
He charg'd to fill, and guide the swelling sails:
Rare gift! but oh, what gift to sools avails.
POPZ, Odyss.

The companions of Ulysses imagined that these bags contained some valuable treasure, and opened them while their leader slept. The tempests bursting out drove the sleet from Ithaca, which was then in sight, and was the cause of a new train of miseries.

m See the third Eneid.

ⁿ See the fixth Eneid, and the eleventh Odyssey.

Gg

What

What warlike rage the victor-kings inspired!

Nor less their armies loyal faith admired.

Nor less his menial train, in wonder lost,

Repeat the gallant deeds that please them most,

Each to his mate, while fixed in fond amaze

The Lusian features every eye surveys;

While present to the view, by Fancy brought,

Arise the wonders by the Lusians wrought,

And each bold feature to their wondering sight

Displays the raptured ardour of the sight.

Apollo now withdrew the chearful day, And left the western sky to twilight grey; Beneath the wave he sought fair Thetis' bed, And to the shore Melinda's Sovereign sped.

What boundless joys are thine, O just Renown, Thou hope of Virtue, and her noblest crown; By thee the seeds of conscious worth are fired, Hero by hero, same by same inspired:
Without thine aid how soon the hero dies!
By thee upborne his name ascends the skies.
This Ammon knew, and own'd his Homer's lyre
The noblest glory of Pelides' ire.

This

This knew Augustus, and from Mantua's shade To courtly ease the Roman bard convey'd; And foon exulting flow'd the fong divine, The noblest glory of the Roman line. Dear was the Muse to Julius; ever dear To gallant Scipio, though the victor-spear One hand employed, yet on the martial field The other knew th' immortal pen to wield. Each glorious chief the victor's palm who bore In Greece, in Latium, or on barbarous shore, Each glorious name, e'er to the Muse endear'd, Or wooed the Muses, or the Muse revered. Alas, on Tago's hapless shores alone The Muse is slighted, and her charms unknown; For this, no Virgil here attunes the lyre, No Homer here awakes the hero's fire. On Tago's shores are Scipios, Cæsars born, And Alexanders Lisbon's clime adorn; But heaven has stampt them in a rougher mould, Nor gave the polish to their genuine gold. Careless and rude or to be known or know. In vain to them the sweetest numbers flow: Unheard, in vain their native poet fings, And cold neglect weighs down the Muse's wings,

Even he whose veins the blood of Gama warms,
Walks by, unconscious of the Muse's charms:
For him no Muse shall leave her golden loom,
No palm shall blossom, and no wreath shall bloom;
Yet shall my labours and my cares be paid
By fame immortal, and by Gama's shade:
Him shall the song on every shore proclaim,
The first of heroes, first of naval same.
Rude and ungrateful though my country be,
This proud example shall be taught by Me,
"Where'er the hero's worth demands the skies,
"To crown that worth some generous bard shall rife!"

Aristotle has pronounced, that the works of Homer contain the perfect model of the epic poem. Homer never gives us any digressive declamation spoken in the person of the poet, or interruptive of the thread of his narration. For this reason Milton's beautiful complaint of his blindness has been censured as a violation of the rules of the Epopea. But it may be presumed there is an appeal beyond the writings of Momer, an appeal to the reason of these rules. When Homer laid the plan of his works, he felt that to write a poem like an history, whose parts had no necessary dependence and connexion with each other, must be uninterresting and tiresomie to the reader of real genius. The unity of one action adorned with proper collateral epifodes therefore presented itself in its progressive dependencies of beginning, middle, and end; or in other words, a description of certain circumstances, the actions which these produce, and the catastrophe. This unity of conduct, as most interesting, is indespensably necessary to the epic poem. But it does not follow, that a declamation in the person of the poet, at the beginning or end of a book, is properly a breach of the unity of the conduct of the action; therefore the omission of such declamations by Homer, as not founded on the nature of the epic poem, is no argu-ment against the use of them. If this however will not be allowed by the critic, let the critic remember, that Homer has many digressive histories, which have no dependence on, or connexion with the action of the poem. If the declamation of Camoens in praise of Poetry must be condemned, what defence can be offered for the long story of Maron's wine in the ninth Odysfey, to which even the numbers of a Pope could give no dignity! Yet however a Bossiu or a Rapin may condemn the digressive exclamations of Camoens, the reader of taste, who judges from what he feels, would certainly be unwilling to have them ex-punged. The declamation with which he concludes the feventh Lusiad, must please, must touch every breast. The feelings of a great spirit in the evening of an active and military life, finking under the pressure of neglect and dependence, yet the complaint expressed with the most manly resentment, cannot fail to interest the generous, and, if adorned with the dress of poetry, to plead an excuse for its admission with the man of taste. The declamation which concludes the present book, has also some arguments to offer in its defence. As the sleet of Gama have now safely conquered many difficulties, and are promised a pilot to conduct them to India, it is a proper contrast to the murmurings of the populace, expres-fed by the old Man, at the end of the fourth Lufiad, and is by no means an improper conclusion to the episode which so highly extols the military same of the Lusian warriors.

In the works of Aaron Hill, Esq; there is a loose paraphrase of the conclusion of this book, in the elegiac or alternate mea-

END OF THE FIFTH BOOK.

THE

LUSIAD.

BOOK VI.

And hospitable rites each hour employ'd,
And hospitable rites each hour employ'd,
For much the king the Lusian band admired,
And much their friendship and their aid desired;
Each hour the gay festivity prolongs,
Melindian dances, and Arabian songs;
Each hour in mirthful transport steals away,
By night the banquet, and the chace by day;
And now the bosom of the deep invites,
And all the pride of Neptune's festive rites;
Their silken banners waving o'er the tide,
A jovial band, the painted galleys ride;

The net and angle various hands employ,

And Moorish timbrels sound the notes of joy.

Such was the pomp, when Egypt's beauteous 'queen

Bade all the pride of naval shew convene,

In pleasure's downy bosom, to beguile

Her love-sick warrior: o'er the breast of Nile

Dazzling with gold the purple ensigns slow'd,

And to the lute the gilded barges row'd,

While from the wave, of many a shining hue,

The anglers' lines the panting sishes drew.

Now from the West the sounding breezes blow,
And far the hoary flood was yet to plow:
The sountain and the field bestow'd their store,
And friendly pilots from the friendly shore,
Train'd in the Indian deep, were now aboard,
When Gama, parting with Melinda's lord,
The holy vows of lasting peace renew'd,
For still the king for lasting friendship sued;

boasted to his mistress of his great dexterity in angling. Cleopatra perceived his art, and as gallantly outwitted him. Some other Divers received her orders, and in a little while Mark Antony's line brought up a fried fish in place of a live one, to the vast entertainment of the queen and all the convivial company. Octavius was at this time on his march to decide who should be master of the world.

² Every display of eastern luxury and magnishence was lavished in the fishing parties on the Nile, with which Cleopatra amused Mark Antony, when at any time he shewed symptoms of uneasiness, or seemed inclined to abandon the esseminate life which he led with his mistress. At one of these parties, Mark Antony having procured Divers to put sishes upon his hooks while under the water, he very gallantly

That Lufus' heroes in his port supplied, And tasted rest, he own'd his dearest pride, And yow'd that ever while the feas they roam, The Lufian fleets should find a bounteous home. And ever from the generous shore receive Whate'er his port, whate'er his land could b give. Nor less his joy the grateful Chief declared; And now to feize the valued hours prepared. Full to the wind the fwelling fails he gave, And his red prows divide the foamy wave: Full to the rifing fun the pilot steers, And far from shore through middle ocean bears. The vaulted sky now widens o'er their heads, Where first the infant morn his radiance sheds. And now with transport sparkling in his eyes Keen to behold the Indian mountains rife, High on the decks each Lusian heroe smiles, And proudly in his thoughts reviews his toils. When the stern Dæmon, burning with disdain, Beheld the fleet triumphant plow the main: The Powers of heaven, and heaven's dread Lord he knew, Refolved in Lisbon glorious to renew and treated him with the utmost courtefy. Their good offices were reciprocal. By the information of the king of Melinda, Cabral escaped the treachery of the king of Calicut. The kings of Mombaze and Quiloa, irritated at the alliance with Portugal, made several depredations on the subjects of Melinda, who in return were effectually revenged by their European allies.

b The friendship of the Portuguese and Melindians was of long continuance. Alvaro Cabral, the second admiral who made the voyage to India, in an engagement with the Moors off the coast of Zofala, took two ships richly freighted from the mines of that country. On finding that Xeques Fonteyma, the commander, was uncle to the king of Melinda, he restored the valuable prize,

The Roman honours---raging with despair From high Olympus' brow he cleaves the air, On earth new hopes of vengeance to devise, And fue that aid deny'd him in the skies; Blaspheming heaven, he pierced the dread abode Of ocean's Lord, and fought the ocean's God. Deep where the bases of the hills extend, And earth's huge ribs of rock enormous bend, Where roaring through the caverns rowl the waves Responsive as the aërial tempest raves, The Ocean's Monarch, by the Nereid train, And watery Gods encircled, holds his reign. Wide o'er the deep, which line could ne'er explore, Shining with hoary fands of filver ore, Extends the level, where the palace rears Its chrystal towers, and emulates the spheres; So starry bright the lofty turrets blaze, And vie in lustre with the diamond's rays. Adorn'd with pillars and with roofs of gold, The golden gates their massy leaves unfold: Inwrought with pearl the lordly pillars shine, The sculptured walls confess an hand divine. Here various colours in confusion lost, Old Chaos' face and troubled image boaft. Here rising from the mass distinct and clear Apart the four fair Elements appear.

BOOK VI.

High o'er the rest ascends the blaze of fire, Nor fed by matter did the rays aspire, But glow'd ætherial, as the living flame, Which, stolen from heaven, inspired the vital frame. Next, all-embracing Air was spread around, Thin as the light, incapable of wound; The fubtle power the burning fouth pervades, And penetrates the depth of polar shades. Here mother Earth, with mountains crown'd, is feen, Her trees in bloffom, and her lawns in green; The lowing beeves adorn the clover vales, The fleecy dams beforead the floping dales; Here land from land the filver streams divide: The sportive fishes through the chrystal tide, Bedropt with gold their shining sides display: And here old Ocean rolls his billows gray: Beneath the moon's pale orb his current flows, And round the earth his giant arms he throws. Another scene display'd the dread alarms Of war in heaven, and mighty Jove in arms; Here Titan's race their swelling nerves distend Like knotted oaks, and from their bases rend And tower the mountains to the thundering sky, While round their heads the forky lightnings fly; Beneath huge Etna vanquish'd Typhon lies, And vomits smoke and fire against the darken'd skies.

Here seems the pictured wall posses'd of 'life;
Two Gods contending in the noble strife,
The choicest boon to human kind to give,
Their toils to lighten, or their wants relieve:
While Pallas here appears to wave her 'hand,
The peaceful olive's golden boughs expand:
Here, while the Ocean's God indignant frown'd,
And raised his trident from the wounded ground,
As yet intangled in the earth appears
The warrior horse, his ample chest he rears,
His wide red nostrils smoke, his eye-balls glare,
And his fore-hoofs, high pawing, lash the air.

Though 'wide and various o'er the sculptured stone. The feats of Gods, and godlike heroes shone;

fable, Neptune and Minerva disputed the honour of giving a name to the city of Athens. They agreed to determine the contest by a display of their wisdom and power, in conferring the most beneficial gift on mankind. Neptune struck the earth with his trident and produced the horse, whose bounding motions are emblematical of the agitation of the sea. Minerva commanded the olive tree, the symbol of peace and of riches, to spring forth. The victory was adjudged to the goddess, from whom the city was named Athens. As the Egyptians and Mexicans wrote their history in hieroglyphics, the taste of the ancient Grecians cloathed almost every occurrence in mythological allegory. The founders of Athens, it is most probable, disputed whether their new city should be named from the fertility of the soil or from the marine situation of Attica. The former opinion prevailed, and the town received its name an honour of the goddes of the olive tree.

d While Pallas here appears to wave her band—As Neptune struck the earth with his trident, Minerva, says the fable, struck the earth with her lance. That she waved her hand while the olive boughs spread, is a fine poetical attitude, and varies the picture from that of Neptune, which follows.

Though wide and various o'er the sculptured stone—The description of palaces is a favourite topic several times touched apon by the two great masters of Epic Poetry, in which they have been happily imitated by their three greatest disciples among the moderns, Camoens, Tasso, and Milton. The description of the palace of Neptune has great merit. Nothing can be more in place than the picture of Choas and the four Elements. The war of the Gods, and the contest of Neptune and Minerva are touched with the true boldness of poetical colouring. But perhaps it deserves censure thus to point out what every Reader of tasse must perceive. To shew to the mere English Reader that the Portuguese Poet is, in his manner, truly classical, is the intention of many of these notes.

On speed the vengeful Dæmon views no more: Forward he rushes through the golden door, Where Ocean's king, enclosed with nymphs divine, In regal state receives the king of Wine: O Neptune! instant as he came, he cries, Here let my presence breed no cold surprise, A friend I come, your friendship to implore Against the Fates unjust, and Fortune's power; Beneath whose shafts the great Celestials bow, Yet ere I more, if more you wish to know, The watery Gods in awful senate call, For all should hear the wrong that touches all. Neptune alarm'd, with instant speed commands From every shore to call the watery bands: Triton, who boasts his high Neptunian race, Sprung from the God by Salace's embrace, Attendant on his fire the trumpet founds, Or through the yielding waves, his herald, bounds: Huge is his bulk deform'd, and dark his hue; His bushy beard and hairs that never knew The smoothing comb, of sea-weed rank and long, Around his breast and shoulders dangling hung, And on the matted locks black mussels clung; A ' shell of purple on his head he bore, Around his loins no tangling garb he wore,

1

! A shell of purple on his head he bore-

Na cabeça por gerra tinha posts Muma mui grande casca de lagosta. But all was cover'd with the slimy brood,
The snaily offspring of the unctuous flood;
And now obedient to his dreadful sire,
High o'er the wave his brawny arms aspire;
To his black mouth his crooked shell applied,
The blast rebellows o'er the ocean wide:
Wide o'er their shores, where'er their waters flow,
The watery powers the awful summons know;
And instant darting to the palace hall,
Attend the founder of the Dardan wall;
Old father Ocean, with his numerous race
Of daughters and of sons, was first in place.
Nereus and Doris, from whose nuptials sprung
The lovely Nereid train for ever young,

Thus rendered by Fanshaw,

He had (for a * Montera) on his crown The shell of a red lobster overgrown.

The description of Triton, who, as Fan-shaw says,

Was a great nafty clown-is in the style of the classics. His parentage is differently related. Hesiod makes him the son of Neptune and Amphitrité. By Triton, in the physical sense of the sable, is meant the noise, and by Salacé, the mother by some ascribed to him, the salt of the ocean. The origin of the sable of Triton, it is probable, was founded on the appearance of a sea animal, which, according to some ancient and modern Naturalists, in the upward parts resembles the human sigure. Pausanias relates a wonderful story of a monstrously large one, which often came ashore on the meadows of Boetias Over his head was a kind of finny cartilage, which, at a distance, appeared like hair, the body covered with brown scales; the nose and ears like the human, the mouth of a dreadful width, jagged with the teeth of a Panther; the eyes of a greenish hue; the hands divided into fingers, the nails of which were crooked, and of a shelly substance. This monster, whose extremities ended in a tail like a dolphin's, devoured both men and beasts as they chanced in his way. The citizens of Tanagra, at last, contrived his destruction. They set a large vessel full of winc on the sea shore. Triton got drunk with it, and fell into a profound sleep, in which condition the Tanagrians beheaded him, and afterwards, with great propriety, hung up his body in the temple of Bacchus; where, fays Paufanias, it continued a long time.

* Montera, the Spanish word for a huntsman's cap.

Who people every fea on every frand Appear'd, attended with their filial band; And changeful Proteus, whose prophetic h mind The fecret cause of Bacchus' rage divined, Attending, left the flocks, his scaly charge, To graze the bitter weedy foam at large. In charms of power the raging waves to tame, The lovely spouse of Ocean's sovereign 'came. From Heaven and Vesta sprung the birth divine, Her snowy limbs bright through the vestments shine. Here with the dolphin, who perfuasive k led Her modest steps to Neptune's spousal bed, Fair Amphitrité moved, more sweet, more gay Than vernal fragrance and the flowers of May; Together with her fister spouse she came, The fame their wedded Lord, their love the fame; The same the brightness of their sparkling eyes, Bright as the fun and azure as the skies. She who the rage of Athamas to ' shun Plunged in the billows with her infant fon;

struck with admiration to find how confenant this is to the facred Scripture; Spiritus

h And changeful Proteus, whose prophetic mind—The fullest and best account of the fable of Proteus is in the fourth Odyssey. 1 Thetis.

k Here with the Dolphin - Castera has a most absurd note on this passage. Neptune, fays he, is the vivifying spirit, and Amphitrité the humidity of the sea, which the Dolphin, the Divine Intelligence, unites for the generation and nourishment of fishes. Who, fays he, cannot but be Domini fertur super aquas; The spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters.

1 She who the rage of Athamas to shun—
Ino, the daughter of Cadmus and Hermione, and second spouse of Athamas, king of Thebes. The sables of her sate are various. That which Camoens follows is the most common. Athamas seized with madness imagined that his spoule was a lionefs.

A Goddess now, a God the smiling boy Together sped; and Glaucus lost to poy, Curst in his love by vengeful Circé's hate, Attending wept his Scylla's hapless fate.

And now affembled in the hall divine,
The ocean Gods in folemn council join;
The Goddesses on pearl embroidery fate,
The Gods on sparkling chrystal chairs of state,
And proudly honour'd on the regal throne,
Beside the ocean's Lord, Thyoneus * shone.
High from the roof the living amber * glows,
High from the roof the stream of glory slows,
And richer fragrance far around exhales
Than that which breathes on fair Arabia's gales.

Attention now in liftening filence waits:
The Power, whose bosom raged against the Fates, lioness, and her two sons young sions. In this frenzy he slew Learchus, and drove the mother and her other son Melicertus into the sea. The corpse of the mother was thrown ashore on Megaria, and that of the son at Corinth. They were afterwards deified, the one as a sea Goddess, the other as the God of harbours.

m—— and Glaucus lost to joy—A fisherman, says the fable, who, on eating a certain herb, was turned into a sea God. Circé was enamoured of him, and in revenge of her slighted love, poisoned the sountain where his mistress usually bathed. By the force of the enchantment the favoured Scylla was changed into a hideous monster, whose loins were surrounded with the ever barking heads of dogs and wolves. Scylla, on this, threw herself into the sea, and was metamorphosed into the rock which bears her name. The rock Scylla at a distance appears like the statue of a woman: The furious dashing of the waves in the cavities which are level with the water, resembles the barking of wolves and dogs. Hence the sable.

n Thyoneus, a name of Bacchus.

o High from the roof the living amber

Pendent by fubtle magic, many a row
Of flarry lamps, and blazing creffets, fed
With naphtha and afphaltus, yielded light
As from a fky.

MILTON.

Rifing,

Rifing, casts round his vengeful eyes, while rage Spread o'er his brows the wrinkled seams of age; O thou, he cries, whose birthright fovereign fway, From pole to pole, the raging waves obey; Of human race 'tis thine to fix the bounds, And fence the nations with thy watery mounds: And thou, dread Power, O father Ocean, hear, Thou, whose wide arms embrace the world's wide sphere, 'Tis thine the haughtiest victor to restrain, And bind each nation in its own domain: And you, ye Gods, to whom the feas are given, Your just partition with the Gods of heaven; You who, of old unpunish'd never bore The daring trespass of a foreign oar; You who beheld, when Earth's dread offspring strove To scale the vaulted sky, the seat of Jove: Indignant Jove deep to the nether world The rebel band in blazing thunders hurl'd. Alas! the great monition lost on you, Supine you flumber, while a roving crew, With impious fearch, explore the watery way, And unrefisted through your empire stray: To feize the facred treasures of the main Their fearless prows your ancient laws disdain: Where far from mortal fight his hoary head Old Ocean hides, their daring fails they spread,

And their glad shouts are ecchoed where the roar Of mounting billows only howl'd before. In wonder, filent, ready Boreas fees Your passive languor, and neglectful ease; Ready with force auxiliar to restrain The bold intruders on your awful reign; Prepared to burst his tempests, as of old, When his black whirlwinds o'er the ocean roll'd, And rent the Mynian P fails, whose impious pride First braved their fury, and your power defied. Nor deem that fraudful I my hope deny; My darken'd glory sped me from the sky. How high my honours on the Indian shore! How foon these honours must avail no more! Unless these rovers, who with doubled shame To stain my conquests, bear my vassal's aname, Unless they perish on the billowy way-Then rouse, ye Gods, and vindicate your sway. The Powers of heaven in vengeful anguish see The Tyrant of the skies, and Fate's decree; The dread decree, that to the Lusian train Configns, betrays your empire of the main: Say, shall your wrong alarm the high abodes, And men exalted to the rank of gods,

P And rent the Mynian Sails--- The sails of the Argonauts, inhabitants of Mynia.

⁴ See the first note on the first book of the Lusiad.

O'er you exalted, while in careless ease You yield the wrested trident of the seas, Usurp'd your monarchy, your honours stained, Your birth-right ravish'd, and your waves profaned! Alike the daring wrong to me, to you, And shall my lips in vain your vengeance sue! This, this to fue from high Olympus bore-More he attempts, but rage permits no more. Fierce bursting wrath the watery gods inspires, And their red eye-balls burn with livid fires: Heaving and panting struggles every breast, With the fierce billows of hot ire opprest. Twice from his feat divining Proteus rose, And twice he shook enraged his sedgy brows: In vain: the mandate was already given, From Neptune fent, to loofe the winds of heaven: In vain; though prophecy his lips inspired, The ocean's queen his filent lips required. Nor less the storm of headlong rage denies, Or council to debate, or thought to rife. And now the God of Tempests swift unbinds From their dark caves the various rushing winds: High o'er the storm the Power impetuous rides, His howling voice the roaring tempest guides; Right to the dauntless fleet their rage he pours, And first their headlong outrage tears the shores:

A deeper night involves the darken'd air,
And livid flashes through the mountains glare:
Up-rooted oaks, with all their leafy pride,
Rowl thundering down the groaning mountains' side;
And men and herds in clamorous uproar run,
The rocking towers and crashing woods to shun.

While thus the council of the watery state Enraged decreed the Lusian heroes' fate, The weary fleet before the gentle gale With joyful hope displayed the steady sail; Thro' the smooth deep they plough'd the lengthening way; Beneath the wave the purple car of day To fable night the eastern sky resign'd, And o'er the decks cold breath'd the midnight wind. All but the watch in warm pavilions slept, The fecond watch the wonted vigils kept: Supine their limbs, the mast supports the head, And the broad yard fail o'er their shoulders spread A grateful cover from the chilly gale, And fleep's foft dews their heavy eyes affail. Languid against the languid Power they strive, And fweet discourse preserves their thoughts alive. When Leonardo, whose enamoured thought In every dream the plighted fair-one fought,

The dews of fleep what better to remove Than the foft, woful, pleafing tales of love? Ill timed, alas, the brave Veloso cries, The tales of love, that melt the heart and eyes. The dear enchantments of the fair I know, The fearful transport and the rapturous woe: But with our state ill suits the grief or joy; Let war, let gallant war our thoughts employ: With dangers threaten'd, let the tale inspire The fcorn of danger, and the hero's fire. His mates with joy the brave Veloso hear, And on the youth the speaker's toil confer. The brave Veloso takes the word with joy, And truth, he cries, shall these slow hours decoy. The warlike tale adorns our nation's fame, The twelve of England give the noble theme.

When Pedro's gallant heir, the valiant John, Gave war's full splendor to the Lusian throne, In haughty England, where the winter spreads His snowy mantle o'er the shining meads',

In haughty England where the winter

His snowy mantle o'er the shining meads.

In the original,

Là na grande Inglaterra, que de neve Boreal sempre abunda——

That is, "In illustrious England, always "covered with northern snow." Though the translator was willing to retain the manner of Homer, he thought it proper to correct the error in natural history fallen into by Camoens. Fanshaw seems to have been sensible of the mistake of his author, and has given the following, uncountenanced by the Portuguese, in place of the eternal snows ascribed to his country.

In merry England, which (from cliffs that fland Like hills of fnow) once Albion's name did git.

The feeds of strife the fierce Erynnis sows;
The baleful strife from court dissention rose.
With every charm adorn'd, and every grace,
That spreads its magic o'er the semale face,
Twelve ladies shined the courtly train among,
The first, the fairest of the courtly throng,
But Envy's breath reviled their injured name,
And stain'd the honour of their virgin same.
Twelve youthful barons own'd the foul report,
The charge at first, perhaps, a tale of sport.
Ah, base the sport that lightly dares defame
The facred honour of a lady's name!
What 'knighthood asks the proud accusers yield,
And dare the damsels' champions to the field.

What knighthood asks the froud accusers vield.

And dare the damfels' champions to the field.

The translator, either by his own refearches, or by his application to some gentlemen who were most likely to inform him, has not been able to discover the slightest vestige of this chivalrous adventure in any memoirs of the English history. It is probable, nevertheless, that however adorned with romantic ornament, it is not entirely without soundation in truth. Castera, who unhappily does not cite his authority, gives the names of the twelve Portuguese champions; Alvaro Vaz d'Almada, afterwards count d'Avranches in Normandy; another Alvaro d'Almada, surnamed the Juster, from his dexterity at that warlike exercise; Lopez Fernando Pacheco; Pedro Homen D'Acosta; Juan Augustin Pereyra; Luis Gonfalez de Malasay; the two brothers Alvaro and Rodrigo Mendez de Cerveyra; Ruy Gomex de Sylva; Soueyro d'Acosta, who gave his name to the river Acosta in Africa; Martin Lopez d'Azevedo; and Alvaro Gonfalez de Coutigno, surnamed Magricio. The names of the English champions and of the ladies, he confesses. are unknown, nor does history positively explain the injury of which the dames complained. It must however, he adds, have been such as required the atonement of blood; il falloit qu'elle fut fanglante, since two sovereigns allowed to determine it by the sword. "Some critics, says Castera, " may perhaps condemn this episode of "Camoens; but for my part (he continues) "I think the adventure of Olindo and So-"phronia, in Tasso, is much more to be blamed. The episode of the Italian poet is totally exuberant, est tout-à-sait possible, whereas that of the Portuguese " has a direct relation to his proposed " fubject; the wars of his country, a vast " field, in which he has admirably fuc-" ceeded, without prejudice to the first rule " of the epopea, the unity of the action." To this may be added the suffrage of Voltaire, who acknowledges that Camoens art-fully interweaves the history of Portugal.

"There let the cause, as honour wills, be tried, " And let the lance and ruthless sword decide." The lovely dames implore the courtly train, With tears implore them, but implore in vain. So famed, fo dreaded tower'd each boaftful knight, 'The damfels' lovers shunn'd the proffer'd fight. Of arm unable to repel the strong, The heart's each feeling conscious of the wrong, When robb'd of all the female breast holds dear, Ah heaven, how bitter flows the female tear! To Lancaster's bold duke the damsels sue; Adown their cheeks, now paler than the hue Of fnowdrops trembling to the chilly gale, The flow-paced chrystal tears their wrongs bewail. When down the beauteous face the dew-drop flows, What manly bosom can its force oppose!

And the severest critic must allow that the episode related by Veloso, is happily introduced. To one who has ever been at sea, the scene must be particularly pleasing. The sleet is under sail, they plough the smooth deep,

And o'er the decks cold breath'd the midnight wind.

All but the fecond watch are assep in their warm pavilions; the second watch sit by the mast sheltered from the chilly gale by a broad sail-cloth; sleep begins to overpower them, and they tell stories to entertain one another. For beautiful picturesque simplicity there is no sea-secone equal to this in the Odyssey or Eneid. And even the prejudice of a Scaliger must have consessed, that the romantic chivalrous narrative of Veloso.

With dangers threaten'd, let the tale inspire The secrn of danger, and the hero's site.

is better adapted to the circumstances of the speaker and his audience, than almost any of the long histories which on all occasions, and sometimes in the heat of battle, the heroes of the lliad relate to each other. Pope has been already cited, as giving his fanction to the fine effect of variety in the epic poem. The present instance, which has a peculiar advantage, in agreeably fufpending the mind of the reader after the sform is raised by the machinations of Bacchus, may be cited as a confirmation of the opinion of that judicious poet. Yet however defensible this episode of Camoens may appear to the translator, he can by no means agree with Castera that the adventure of Olindo and Sophronia, in Tasso, is totally exuberant. Like the epifode of Veloso, it is intimately connected with the subject and action of the poem. See the second book of the Gierujalemme Liberata. His

His hoary curls th' indignant hero shakes, And all his youthful rage restored awakes: Though loth, he cries, to plunge my bold compeers In civil discord, yet appease your tears: From Lusitania - for on Lusian ground Brave Lancaster had strode with lawrel crown'd: Had mark'd how bold the Lusian heroes shone. What ' time he claim'd the proud Castilian throne, How matchless pour'd the tempest of their might, When thundering at his fide they ruled the fight: Nor less their ardent passion for the fair, Generous and brave, he view'd with wondering care, When crown'd with roses to the nuptial bed The warlike John his lovely daughter led -From Lusitania's clime, the hero cries, The gallant champions of your fame shall rife. Their hearts will burn, for well their hearts I know, To pour your vengeance on the guilty foe. Let courtly phrase the heroes' worth admire, And for your injured names that worth require: Let all the foft endearments of the fair, And words that weep your wrongs, your wrongs declare. Myfelf the heralds to the chiefs will fend, And to the king my valiant fon commend.

tered Galicia, and was proclaimed king o Castile at the city of St. Jago de Compostella. He afterwards relinquished his pretensions on the marriage of his daughter Catalina with the infant Don Henry of Castile. See the second note, p. 167.

[&]quot;What time be claim'd the proud Castilian throne.— John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, claimed the crown of Castile in the right of his wife, Donna Constantia, daughter of Don Pedro, the late king. Assisted by his fon-in-law, John I. of Portugal, he en-

He spoke; and twelve of Lusian race he names, All noble youths, the champions of the dames. The dames by lot their gallant champions 'chuse, And each her hero's name exulting views. Each in a various letter hails her chief, And earnest for his aid relates her grief: Each to the king her courtly homage fends, And valiant Lancaster their cause commends. Soon as to Tagus' shores the heralds came, Swift through the palace pours the fprightly flame Of high-foul'd chivalry; the monarch glows First on the listed field to dare the foes; But regal state withheld. Alike their fires Each courtly noble to the toil aspires: High on his helm, the envy of his peers, Each chosen knight the plume of combat wears. In that proud port half circled by the "wave, Which Portugallia to the nation gave, A deathless name, a speedy sloop receives The sculptured bucklers, and the clasping greaves, The fwords of Ebro, spears of lofty fize, And breast-plates flaming with a thousand dyes, the dames by lot their gallant champions chuse.—The ten champions, who in the fifth book of the Jerusalem are fent by Godfrey for the assistance of Armida, are chosen by lot. Tasso, who had read the Lusiad, and admired its author, undoubtedly had the Portuguese poet in his eye.

In that proud port half circled by the avave,
Which Portugallia to the nation gave,
A deathless name——Oporto, called by the Romans Calle. Hence Portugal.

Helmets high plumed, and, pawing for the fight. Bold steeds, whose harness shone with filvery light Dazzling the day. And now the rifing gale Invites the heroes, and demands the fail, When brave Magricio thus his peers addrest, Oh, friends in arms, of equal powers confest, Long have I hoped through foreign climes to stray, Where other streams than Douro wind their way; To note what various shares of bliss and woe From various laws and various customs flow; Not deem that artful I the fight decline; England shall know the combat shall be mine. By land I speed, and should dark fate prevent, For death alone shall blight my firm intent, Small may the forrow for my absence be, For yours were conquest, though unshared by me. Yet fomething more than human warms my breast, And fudden whifpers, In our fortunes bleft, Nor envious chance, nor rocks, nor whelmy tide, Shall our glad meeting at the lift divide.

He faid; and now the rites of parting friends Sufficed, through Leon and Casteel he bends.

Literally, "But if my spirit truly divine." Thus rendered by Fanshaw,

But in my aug'ring ear a bird doth sing.

On many a field enrapt the hero stood, And the proud scenes of Lusian conquest viewed. Navar he past, and past the dreary wild, Where rocks on rocks o'er yawning glyns are piled; The wolf's dread range, where to the evening skies In clouds involved the cold Pyrenians rife. Through Gallia's flowery vales and wheaten plains He strays, and Belgia now his steps detains. There, as forgetful of his vow'd intent, In various cares the fleeting days he fpent: His peers the while direct to England's strand, Plough the chill northern wave; and now at land, Adorn'd in armour, and embroidery gay, To lordly London hold the crowded way: Bold Lancaster receives the knights with joy, The feaft and warlike fong each hour employ. The beauteous dames attending wake their fire, With tears enrage them, and with fmiles inspire. And now with doubtful blushes rose the day, Decreed the rites of wounded fame to pay. The English monarch gives the listed bounds, And, fixt in rank, with shining spears surrounds. Before their dames the gallant knights advance, Each like a Mars, and shake the beamy lance: The dames, adorn'd in filk and gold, display A thousand colours glittering to the day;

K k 2

Alone in tears, and doleful mourning, came,
Unhonour'd by her knight, Magricio's dame.
Fear not our prowefs, cry the bold Eleven,
In numbers, not in might, we stand uneven.
More could we spare, secure of dauntless might,
When for the injured semale name we fight.

Beneath a canopy of regal state, High on a throne the English monarch sate; All round the ladies and the barons bold, Shining in proud array their stations hold. Now o'er the theatre the champions pour, And facing three to three, and four to four, Flourish their arms in prelude. From the bay Where flows the Tagus to the Indian fea; The fun beholds not in his annual race A twelve more fightly, more of manly grace Than tower'd the English knights. With froathing jaws Furious each steed the bit restrictive gnaws, And rearing to approach the rearing foe; Their wavy manes are dash'd with foamy snow: Crofs-darting to the fun a thousand rays The champions' helmets as the chrystal blaze. Ah now, the trembling ladies' cheeks how wan! Cold crept their blood; when through the tumult ran

A shout

A fhout loud gathering; turn'd was every eye Where rose the shout, the sudden cause to spy. And lo, in shining arms a warrior rode, With conscious pride his snorting courser trod; Low to the monarch and the dames he bends, And now the great Magricio joins his friends. With looks that glowed, exulting rose the fair, Whose wounded honour claim'd the hero's care. Aside the doleful weeds of mourning thrown, In dazzling purple and in gold she shone. Now loud the fignal of the fight rebounds Quivering the air, the meeting shock resounds Hoarfe uproar; bucklers dashed on bucklers ring, The splintered lances round their helmets sing. Their fwords flash lightning, darkly reeking o'er The shining mail-plates flows the purple gore. Torn by the spur, the loosened reins at large, Furious the steeds in thundering plunges charge; Trembles beneath their hoofs the folid ground, And thick the fiery sparkles flash around, A dreadful blaze! with pleasing horror thrill'd' The croud behold the terrors of the field. Here stunn'd and staggering with the forceful blow, A bending champion grasps the saddle-bow; Here backward bent a falling knight reclines, His plumes dishonour'd lash the courser's loins.

So tired and stagger'd toil'd the doubtful fight, When great Magricio kindling all his might Gave all his rage to burn: with headlong force, Conscious of victory, his bounding horse Wheels round and round the foe; the hero's spear Now on the front, now flaming on the rear, Mows down their firmest battle; groans the ground, The splinter'd shields and closen helms resound Beneath his courfer; torn the harness gay Here from the master springs the steed away; Obscene with dust and gore, slow from the ground Rising, the master rowls his eyes around, Pale as a spectre on the Stygian coast, In all the rage of shame confused and lost: Here low on earth, and o'er the riders thrown, The wallowing courfers and the riders groan: Before their glimmering vision dies the light, And deep descends the gloom of death's eternal night. They now who boasted, "Let the sword decide," Alone in flight's ignoble aid confide: Loud to the skies the shout of joy proclaims The spotless honour of the ladies' names.

In painted halls of state and rosy bowers,
The twelve brave Lusians crown the festive hours.

Bold Lancaster the princely feast bestows, The goblet circles, and the music flows; And every care, the transport of their joy, To tend the knights the lovely dames employ; The green-boughed forests by the lawns of Thames Behold the victor-champions and the dames Rouse the tall roe-buck o'er the dews of morn, While through the dales of Kent resounds the bugle-horn. The fultry noon the princely banquet owns, The minstrel's song of war the banquet crowns; And when the shades of gentle evening fall, Loud with the dance resounds the lordly hall: The golden roofs, while Vesper shines, prolong The measured cadence, and accomp'nied fong. Thus past the days on England's happy strand, Till the dear memory of their natal land Sigh'd for the banks of Tagus. Yet the breast Of brave Magricio spurns the thoughts of rest. In Gaul's proud court he fought the listed plain; In arms an injured lady's knight again. As Rome's Corvinus o'er the field he ' strode, And on the foe's huge cuirass proudly trod.

pecked his face and hand, and sometimes blinded him with the slapping of his wings. The victor was thence named Corvinus. Vid. Liv. 1. 7. c. 26.

y As Rome's Corvinus—Valerius Maximus, a Roman tribune, who fought and flew a Gaul of enormous stature, in single combat. During the duel a raven perched on the helm of his antagonist, sometimes

No more by Tyranny's proud tongue reviled,
The Flandrian countess on her hero ² smiled.
The Rhine another past, and proved his ⁴ might,
A fraudful German dared him to the fight.
Strain'd in his grasp the fraudful boaster fell—
Here sudden stopt the youth; the distant yell
Of gathering tempest sounded in his ears,
Unheard, unheeded by his listening peers.
Earnest at full they urge him to relate
Magricio's combat, and the German's fate.

The Flandrian countess on her hero smiled.

The princess, for whom Magricio signalized his valour, was Isabella of Portugal, and spouse to Philip the Good, duke of Bargundy, and earl of Flanders. Some Spanish chronicles relate, that Charles VII. of France, having affembled the states of his kingdom, cited Philip to appear with his other vassals. Isabella, who was present, solemnly protested that the earls of Flanders were not obliged to do homage. A dispute arose, on which she offered, according to the custom of that age, to appeal to the sate of arms. The proposal was accepted, and Magricio the champion of Isabella vanquished a French chevalier, appointed by Charles. Though our authors do not mention this adventure, and though Emmanuel de Faria, and the best Pontuguese writers treat it with doubt, nothing to the disadvantage of Camoens is thence to be inferred. A poet is not obliged always to follow the truth of history.

follow the truth of history.

^a The Rhine another past, and prov'd his might—This was Alvaro Vaz d'Almada.

The chronicle of Garibay relates, that at Basil he received from a German a chalenge to measure swords, on condition that each should sight with the right side unarmed; the German by this hoping to be victorious, for he was lest-handed. The Portuguese, suspecting no fraud, accepted.

When the combat began he perceived the inequality. His right fide unarmed was exposed to the enemy, whose lest side, which was nearest to him, was desended with half a cuirass. Notwithstanding all this, the brave Alvaro obtained the victory. He sprung upon the German, seized him, and grasping him forcibly in his arms, stisled and crushed him to death; initating the conduct of Hercules, who in the same manner slew the cruel Anteus. Here we ought to remark the address of our author; he describes at length the injury and grief of the English ladies, the voyage of the twelve champions to England, and the prowess they there displayed. When Veloso relates these, the sea is calm; but no sooner does it begin to be troubled, than the foldier abridges his recital: we see him follow by degrees the preludes of the strom, we perceive the anxiety of his mind on the view of the approaching danger, hastening his narration to an end. Voilà ce que s'appelle des coups de maître. Behold the strokes of a master. This note, and the one preceding, are from Castera.

Joam Franco Barreto, whose short nomenclater is printed as an index to the Portuguese editions of the Lusiad, informs us, that Magricio was son of the marischal Conçalo Coutinho, and brother to Don Vasco Coutinho, the first count de Marialva.

When

When shrilly whistling through the decks resounds The master's call, and loud his voice rebounds: Instant from converse and from slumber start Both bands, and instant to their toils they dart. Aloft, oh speed, down, down the topsails, cries The Master, sudden from my earnest eyes Vanish'd the stars, slow rowls the hollow sigh, The storm's dread herald.—To the topsails fly The bounding youths, and o'er the yard-arms whirl The whizzing ropes, and swift the canvas furl; When from their grasp the bursting tempests bore The sheets half-gathered, and in fragments tore. Strike, strike the mainfail, loud again he rears His ecchoing voice; when roaring in their ears, As if the starry vault by thunders riven, Rush'd downward to the deep the walls of heaven, With headlong weight a fiercer blast descends, And with sharp whirring crash the main-sail rends; Loud shrieks of horror through the fleet resound, Bursts the torn cordage, rattle far around The splinter'd yard-arms; from each bending mast, In many a shred, far streaming on the blast The canvas floats; low finks the leeward fide, O'er the broad vessels rolls the swelling tide; O strain each nerve, the frantic Pilot cries, Oh now - and instant every nerve applies,

Tugging what cumbrous lay with strainful force; Dash'd by the ponderous loads the surges hoarse Roar in new whirls: the dauntless foldiers ran To pump, yet ere the groaning pump began The wave to vomit, o'er the decks o'erthrown In groveling heaps the stagger'd foldiers groan: So rowls the veffel, not the boldest Three, Of arm robustest, and of firmest knee, Can guide the starting rudder; from their hands The helm bursts; scarce a cable's strength commands The staggering fury of its starting bounds, While to the forceful beating furge refounds The hollow crazing hulk: with kindling rage The adverse winds the adverse winds engage, As from its base of rock their banded power Strove in the dust to strew some lordly tower, Whose dented battlements in middle sky Frown on the tempest and its rage defy; So roar'd the winds: high o'er the rest upborne On the wide mountain-wave's flant ridge forlorn, At times discover'd by the lightnings blue, Hangs GAMA's lofty vessel, to the view Small as her boat; o'er Paulus' fhatter'd prore Falls the tall main-mast prone with crashing roar; Their hands, yet grasping their uprooted hair, The failors lift to heaven in wild despair,

The Saviour God each yelling voice implores, Nor less from brave Coello's war-ship pours The shriek shrill rolling on the tempest's wings: Dire as the bird of death at midnight fings His dreary howlings in the fick man's ear, The answering shriek from ship to ship they hear. Now on the mountain-billows upward driven, The navy mingles with the clouds of heaven; Now rushing downward with the finking waves, Bare they behold old Ocean's vaulty caves. The eastern blast against the western pours, Against the southern storm the northern roars: From pole to pole the flashy lightnings glare, One pale blue twinkling sheet enwraps the air, In fwift fuccession now the volleys fly Darted in pointed curvings o'er the sky; And through the horrors of the dreadful night, O'er the torn waves they shed a ghastly light; The breaking furges flame with burning red, Wider and louder still the thunders spread, As if the folid heavens together crush'd, Expiring worlds on worlds expiring rush'd, And dim-brow'd Chaos struggled to regain The wild confusion of his ancient reign. Not fuch the volley when the arm of Jove From heaven's high gates the rebel Titans drove;

Not such sierce lightnings blazed athwart the flood,
When, saved by heaven, Deucalion's vessel rode High o'er the deluged hills. Along the shore
The Halcyons, mindful of their fate, * deplore;
As beating round on trembling wings they fly,
Shrill through the storm their woeful clamours die.
So from the tomb, when midnight veils the plains,
With b shrill, faint voice, th' untimely ghost complains.
The amorous dolphins to their deepest caves
In vain retreat to fly the surious waves;

The Halcyons, mindful of their fate, deplore-Ceyx, king of Trachinia, fon of Lucifer, married Alcyone, the daughter of Eolus. On a voyage to confult the Delphic Oracle he was shipwrecked. His corpse was thrown ashore in the view of his spouse, who in the agonies of her love and despair, threw herself into the sea. The Gods, in pity of her pious fidelity, metamorphofed them into the birds which bear her name. The Halcyon is a little bird about the fize of a thrush, its plumage of a beautiful sky blue, mixed with some traits of white and carnation. It is vulgarly called the King, or Martin Fisher. The Halcyons very seldom appear but in the shell weather, whence they are fabled to build their nests on the waves. The female is no lefs remarkable than the turtle, for her conjugal affection. She nourishes and attends the male when fick, and survives his death but a few days. When the Halcyons are furprifed in a tempest, they fly about as in the utmost terror, with the most lamentable and doleful cries. To introduce them therefore in the picture of a storm, is a proof both of the taste and judgment of Camoens.

With shrill faint voice th' untimely ghost complains——It may not perhaps be unentertaining to cite Madam Dacier, and Mr. Pope on the voices of the dead. It will, at least, afford a critical observation, which appears to have escaped them both. "The thades of the suitors, (observes Dacier) when they are summoned by Mercury out of the palace of Ulysses, emit a seeble, plaintive; inarticulate, sound, restend, strident: whereas Agamemnon, and the shades that have been long in the state of the dead, speak articulately. I doubt not but Homer intended to shew, by the former description, that when the soul is separated from the organs of the body, it ceases to act after the same manner as while it was joined to it; but how the dead recover their voices afterwards is not easy to understand. In other respects Virgil paints after Homer:

Exiguam: inceptus clamor frustratur biantes."

To this Mr. Pope replies, "But why should we suppose with Dacier, that these shades of the suitors (of Penelope) have lost the faculty of speaking; I rather imagine that the sounds they uttered were signs of complaint and discontent, and proceeded not from an inability to speak. After Patroclus was slain, he appears to Achilles, and speaks very articulately to him; yet to express his sorrow at his departure, he acts like these suitors: for Achilles

Like a thin smoke beholds the spirit fly, And hears a feeble, lamentable cry.

Dacier conjectures, that the power of speech ceases in the dead, till they are admitted into a state of rest; but Patroclus is an in-

High o'er the mountain-capes the ocean flows,
And tears the aged forests from their brows:
The pine and oak's huge sinewy roots uptorn,
And from their beds the dusky sands, upborne.
On the rude whirlings of the billowy sweep.
Imbrown the surface of the boiling deep.
High to the poop the valiant GAMA springs,
And all the rage of grief his bosom wrings,
Grief to behold, the while fond hope enjoy'd.
The meed of all his toils, that hope destroy'd.
In awful horror lost the hero stands,
And rowls his eyes to heaven, and spreads his hands,
While to the clouds his vessel rides the swell,
And now her black keel strikes the gates of hell;

stance to the contrary in the Iliad, and Elpenor in the Odyssey, for they both speak before their functeal rites are performed, and consequently before they enter into a state of repose amongst the shades of the happy."

The Critic, in his fearch for distant proofs, often omits the most material one immediately at hand. Had Madam Dacier attended to the episode of the souls of the suitors, the world had never seen her ingenuity in these mythological conjectures; nor had Mr. Pope any need to bring the case of Patroclus or Elpenor to overthrow her system. Amphimedon, one of the suitors, in the very episode which gave birth to Dacier's conjecture, tells his story very articulately to the shade of Agamemnon, though the had not received the sunereal rites:

Our mangled bodies now deform'd with gore, Gold and neglected spread the marble shoor: No friend to bathe our wounds! or tears to shed:
O'er the pale corse! the honours of the dead.
ODYSS, XXIV.

On the whole, the defence of Pope is almost as idle as the conjectures of Dacier. The plain truth is, Poetry delights in Personification; every thing in it, as Aristotle says of the Iliad, has manners; poetry must therefore personify according to our ideas. Thus in Milton:

Tears, such as angels weep, burst forth——
And thus in Homer, while the fuitors are conducted to hell;

Trembling the spectres glide, and plaintive vent Thin, hollow screams, along the deep descent: and, unfettered with mythological distinctions, either strick or articulately talk, according to the most poetical view of their supposed circumstances.

Oh thou, he cries, whom trembling heaven obeys, Whose will the tempest's furious madness sways, Who, through the wild waves, led'ft thy chofen race; While the high billows stood like walls of brass: Oh thou, while ocean bursting o'er the world Roar'd o'er the hills, and from the sky down hurl'd Rush'd other headlong oceans; oh, as then The fecond father of the race of men Safe in thy care the dreadful billows rode, Oh! fave us now, be now the faviour God! Safe in thy care, what dangers have we past! And shalt thou leave us, leave us now at last To perish here - our dangers and our toils To spread thy laws unworthy of thy smiles; Our vows unheard - Heavy with all thy weight, Oh horror, come! and come, eternal night!

He paused;—then round his eyes and arms he threw. In gesture wild, and thus; Oh happy you!

You, who in Afric fought for holy faith,
And, pierced with Moorish spears, in glorious death
Beheld the smiling heavens your toils reward,
By your brave mates beheld the conquest shared;
Oh happy you, on every shore renown'd!

Your vows respected and your wishes crown'd.

BOOK VI. THE LUSIAD.

He spoke; redoubled raged the mingled blasts; Through the torn cordage and the shatter'd masts The winds loud whiftled, fiercer lighnings blazed, And louder roars the doubled thunders raised, The sky and ocean blending, each on fire, Seem'd as all Nature struggled to expire. When now the filver star of Love appear'd, Bright in her east her radiant front she rear'd; Fair through the horrid storm the gentle ray Announced the promise of the cheerful day; From her bright throne Celestial Love beheld The tempest burn, and blast on blast impell'd: And must the furious Dæmon still, she cries, Still urge his rage, nor all the past suffice! Yet as the past, shall all his rage be vain —— She spoke, and darted to the roaring main; Her lovely nymphs she calls, the nymphs obey, Her nymphs the Virtues who confess her sway; Round every brow she bids the rose-buds twine, And every flower adown the locks to shine, The fnow-white lily and the laurel green, And pink and yellow as at strife be seen. Instant amidst their golden ringlets strove Each flowret planted by the hand of Love; At strife, who first th' enamour'd Powers to gain, Who rule the tempests and the waves restrain:

Bright as a starry band the Nereids shone. Instant old Eolus' sons their presence own: The winds die faintly, and in foftest fighs Each at his Fair one's feet desponding lies. The bright Orithia, threatening, sternly chides The furious Boreas, and his faith derides: The furious Boreas owns her powerful bands: Fair Galatea, with a finile commands The raging Notus, for his love, how true, His fervent passion and his faith she knew. Thus every nymph her various Lover chides: The filent winds are fetter'd by their brides; And to the Goddess of Celestial loves, Mild as her look, and gentle as her doves In flowery bands are brought. Their amorous flame The Queen approves, and ever burn the same, She cries, and joyful on the Nymphs' fair hands, Th' Eolian race receive the Queen's commands, And vow, that henceforth her Armada's fails Should gently fwell with fair propitious d gales.

the Armada thus obscurely anticipated, refembles in particular the prophecy of the fafe return of Ulysses to Ithaca, foretold by the shade of Tiresias, which was asterwards suffilled by the Phæacians. It remains now to make some observations on the machinery used by Camoens in this book. The necessity of machinery in the Epopea, and the perhaps infurmountable difficulty of finding one unexceptionably adapted to a Poem where the heroes are Christians,

e For the fable of Eolus see the tenth a And vow, that benceforth ber Armada's fails

Should gently fwell with fair propitious gales.

—In innumerable instances Camoens discovers himself a judicious imitator of the ancients. In the two great masters of the Epic are feveral prophecies oracular of the fate of different heroes, which give an air of folemn importance to the Poem. The fate of

Now morn arose serene in dappled grey,

Pale gleamed the wave beneath the golden ray;

Blue o'er the silver slood the mountains rose,

Where, crown'd with palm, the murmuring Ganges slows;

The sailors on the main-top's airy round,

With waving hand, Land, land, aloud resound;

Aloud the Pilot of Melinda cries,

Behold, O Chief, the shores of India rise!

Elate the joyful crew on tip-toe trod,

And every breast with swelling raptures glow'd;

Gama's great soul confest the rushing swell,

Prone on his manly knees the Hero fell,

Christians, or, in other words, to a Poem whose subject is modern, have already been observed in the Preface. The machinery of Camoens has also been proved, in every respect, to be less exceptionable than that of Tasso in his ferusalem, or that of Voltaire in his Henriade. To imitate the manners of the ancients, was the reigning taste at the revival of letters. If therefore we excuse Camoens for writing in the taste of his age, the executive part of his machinery, it is presumed, will require no apology. The descent of Bacchus to the palace of Neptune in the depths of the sea, and his address to the watery Gods are noble imitations of Virgil's Juno in the first Eneid. The description of the storm is also masterly. In both instances the conduct of the Eneid is joined with the descriptive exu-berance of the Odyssey. The appearance of the star of Venus through the storm is finely imagined, the influence of the nymphs of that Goddess over the winds, and their subsequent nuptials, are in the spirit of the promise of Juno to Eolus;

Sunt mibi bis septem præssanti corpore nymphæ: Quarum, quæ sorma pulcherrima, Disopeiam Connubio jungam stabili, propriamque dicabo: Omnes ut tecum meritis pro talibus annos Exigat, & pulchra saciat te prole parentem. And the fiction itself is an allegory exactly in the manner of Homer. Orithia, the daughter of Erecteus, and queen of the Amazons, was ravished and carried away by Boreas. Her name derived from $\delta_{e^{0.5}}$, bound or limit, and $\theta \ell \alpha$, violence, implies that she moderated the rage of her husband. In the same manner, Galatea, derived from $\gamma \acute{\alpha} \lambda \alpha$, milk, and $\Theta \epsilon \acute{\alpha}$, a Goddess, signifies the Goddess of candour or innocence.

"If one would speak poetically, says Bossu, he must imitate Homer. Homer will not say that salt has the virtue to preserve dead bodies, or that the sea presented Achilles a remedy to preserve the corps of Patroclus from putresaction: He makes the sea Goddess, and tells us that Thetis, to comfort Achilles, promised to persume the body with an Ambrosia, which should keep it a whole year from corruption.—All this is told us poetically, the whole is reduced into action. the sea is made a person who speaks and acts, and this prosepozeia is accompanied with passion, tenderness, and affection."

It has been observed by the critics, that Homer, in the battle of the Gods, has, with great propriety, divided their auxiliary forces. On the side of the Greeks he places all the Gods who preside over the arts and

Oh bounteous heaven, he cries, and spreads his hands To bounteous heaven, while boundless joy commands No farther word to flow. In wonder lost, As one in horrid dreams through whirlpools tost, Now snatch'd by Dæmons rides the flaming air, And howls, and hears the howlings of despair; Awaked, amazed, confused with transport glows, And, trembling still, with troubled joy o'erslows; So yet affected with the sickly weight Lest by the horrors of the dreadful night, The Hero wakes in raptures to behold The Indian shores before his prows unfold: Bounding he rises, and with eyes on fire Surveys the limits of his proud desire.

fciences. Mars and Venus favour the adultery of Paris, and Apollo is for the Trojans, as their strength consisted chiesly in the use of the bow. Talking of the battle, "With what art, says Eustathius, as cited by Pope, does the Poet engage the Gods in this consist! Neptune opposes Apollo, which implies, that things moist and dry are in continual discord. Pallas sights with Mars, which signifies that rashness and wisdom always disagree: Juno is against Diana, that is, nothing more disfers from a marriage state than celibacy: Vulcan engages Xanthus, that is, sire and water are in perpetual variance. Thus we have a fine allegory concealed under the veil of excellent poetry, and the Reader conceives a double satisfaction at the same time, from the beautiful verses and an instructive moral." And again, "The combat of Mars and Pallas is plainly allegorical. Justice and Wissom demanded, that an end should be put to this terrible war:

the God of war opposes this, but is worsted.

—No sooner has our reason subdued one temptation, but another succeeds to re-inforce it, thus Venus succeurs Mars.—Fallas retreated from Mars in order to conquer him; this shews us that the best way to subdue a temptation is to retreat from it."

These explications of the manner of Homer ought, in justice, to be applied to his imitator; nor is the moral part of the allegory of Camoens less exact than the mythological. In the present instances, his allegory is peculiarly happy. The rage and endeavours of the evil Dæmon to prevent the interests of Christianity are strongly marked. The storm which he raises is the tumult of the human passions; these are most effectually subdued by the instruce of the virtues, which more immediately depend upon Celestial Love; and the union which she confirms between the virtues and passions, is the surest pledge of suture tranquillity.

O glorious chief, while storms and oceans raved, What hopeless toils thy dauntless valour braved! By toils like thine the brave ascend to heaven, By toils like thine immortal fame is given. Not he, who daily moves in ermine gown, Who nightly flumbers on the couch of down; Who proudly boasts through heroes old to trace The lordly lineage of his titled race; Proud of the smiles of every courtier lord, A welcome guest at every courtier's board; Not he, the feeble son of ease, may claim Thy wreathe, O GAMA, or may hope thy fame. 'Tis he, who nurtured on the tented field, From whose brown cheek each tint of fear expell'd, With manly face unmoved, secure, serene, Amidst the thunders of the deathful scene, From horror's mouth dares fnatch the warrior's crown, His own his honours, all his fame his own: Who proudly just to honour's stern commands, The dogstar's rage on Afric's burning fands, Or the keen air of midnight polar skies, Long watchful by the helm, alike defies: Who on his front, the trophies of the wars, Bears his proud knighthood's badge, his honest scars; Who cloath'd in steel, by thirst, by famine worn, Through raging feas by bold ambition borne,

Scornful

Scornful of gold, by noblest ardour fired,

Each wish by mental dignity inspired,

Prepared each ill to suffer or to dare,

To bless mankind, his great, his only care;

Him whom her son mature Experience owns,

Him, him alone Heroic Glory crowns.

Once more the translator is tempted to confess his opinion, that the contrary practice of Homer and Virgil affords in reality mo reasonable objection against the exclamatory exuberances of Camoens. Homer, though the father of the epic poem, has his exuberances, as has been observed in the preface, which violently trespass against the first rule of the Epopea, the unity of the action. A rule which, strictly speaking, is not outraged by the digressive exclamations of Camoens. The one now before us, as the severest critic must allow, is happily adapted to the subject of the book. The great dangers which the hero had hitherto encountered, are particularly described. He is afterwards brought in safety to the Indian shore, the object of his ambition, and of all his toils. The exclamation therefore on the grand hinge of the poem, has its propriety, and discovers the warmth of its author's genius. It must also please, as it is strongly characteristical of the temper of our military poet. The manly contempt with which he speaks of the luxurious inactive courtier, and the delight and honour with which he talks of the toils of the soldier, present his own active life to the reader of sensibility. His campaigns in Africa, where in a gallant attack he lost an eye, his dangerous life at sea, and the military fatigues and the battles in which he bore an honourable share in India, sife to our idea, and possess us with an esteem and admiration of our martial poet, who thus could look back with a gallant enthusiasm, though his modesty does not mention himself, on all the hardships he had endured: who thus could bravely esteem the dangers to which he had been exposed, and by which he had severely suffered, as the most desireable occurrences of his life, and the ornament of his name.

END OF THE SIXTH BOOK.

THE

L U S I A D.

B O O K VII.

For you by Ganges' lengthening banks unfold!

What laurel forests on the shores of gold

For you their honours ever verdant rear,

Proud with their leaves to twine the Lusian spear!

Ah heaven! what fury Europe's sons controuls! What self-consuming discord fires their souls! Gainst her own breast her sword Germania turns, Through all her states fraternal rancour burns;

Some blindly wandering holy Faith disclaim. And fierce through all wild rages civil flame. High found the titles of the English crown, King of Jerusalem, his own brenown! Alas, delighted with an airy name, The thin dim shadow of departed fame, England's stern Monarch, sunk in soft repose, Luxurious riots mid his northern snows: Or if the starting burst of rage succeed. His brethren are his foes, and Christians bleed; While Hagar's brutal race his titles stain, In weeping Salem unmolested reign, And with their rites impure her holy shrines profane. And thou, O Gaul, with gaudy trophies plumed, Most Christian named; alas, in vain assumed! What impious lust of empire steels thy breast From their just Lords the Christian lands to wrest!

a Some blindly wandering holy Faith difelaim—The confliction of Germany, obferves Puffendorf, may be faid to verify the fable of the Hydra, with this difference, that the heads of the German state bite and devour each other. At the time when Camoens wrote, the German empire was plunged into all the miseries of a religious war, the Catholics using every endeavour to rivet the chains of Popery, the adherents of Luther as strenuously endeavouring to shake them off.

b High sound the titles of the English crown, King of Jerusalem—This is a mistake. The title of King of Jerusalem was never assumed by the Kings of England. Robert, Duke of Normandy, son of William the Conqueror, was elected King of Jerusalem by the army in Syria, but declined it in hope of ascending the throne of England, which attempt was defeated. Regnier, Count d'Anjou, father of Margaret, queen of Henry VI. was flattered with the mock royalty of Naples, Cyprus, and Jerusalem, his armorial bearing for the latter, Luna, a cross potent, between four crosses Sol. Hen. VIII. filled the throne of England when our author wrote: his gothic luxury and conjugal brutality amply deserved the cenfure of the honest Poet.

"What impious lust of empire steels thy breast—The French Translator very cordially agrees with the Portuguese Poet in the strictures upon Germany, England, and Italy. But when his own country is touched upon, "Malgré l'estime, says he, que j'ai pour mon auteur, je ne craindrai pas de dire qu'il tombe ici dans une grande injustice: For all

While Holy Faith's hereditary foes
Posses the treasures where Cynisio 4 slows;
And all secure, behold their harvests smile
In waving gold along the banks of Nile.
And thou, O lost to glory, lost to same,
Thou dark oblivion of thy ancient name,
By every vicious luxury debased,
Each noble passion from thy breast erased,
Nerveless in sloth, enseebling arts thy boast.
Oh! Italy, how fallen, how low, how lost!

the regard I have for my Author, I will not hefitate to fay, that here he has committed an enormous injustice." All Europe besides however will witness the truth of the assertion, which stigmatizes the French politics with the lust of extending their monarchy.

d ---- where Cynifio flows----- A river in Africa.

Ob! Italy, bow fallen, bow low, bow lost!-However these severe resections on modern Italy may displease the admirers of Italian manners, the picture on the whole is too just to admit of consutation. Never did the history of any court afford such instances of villainy and all the baseness of intrigue as that of the Popes. The faith and honour of gentlemen banished from the politics of the Vatican, every public virtue must of consequence decline among the higher ranks, while the lower, broken by oppression, sunk into the deepest poverty, and its attendant vices of meanness and pu-fillanimity. That this view of the lower ranks in the Pope's dominions is just, we have the indubitable testimony of an Addison, confirmed by the miserable depopulation of a province, which was once the finest and most populous of the Roman empire. It has long been the policy of the court of Spain, to encourage the luxury and effeminate diffipation of the Neapolitan nobility; and those of modern Venice resemble their warlike ancestors only in name.

That Italy can boast many individuals of a different character, will by no means over-throw these general observations sounded on the testimony of the most authentic Writers. Our Poet is besides justifiable, in his censures, for he only follows the severe restections of the greatest of the Italian Poets. It were easy to give fifty instances, two or three however shall suffice. Dante in his sixth Canto, del Purg.

Abi, ferva Italia, di dolore oftello, Nave fenza nocchiero in gran tempefta, Non donna di provincie, ma bordello—

"Ah, stavish Italy, the Inn of dolour, a ship without a pilot in a horrid tempest, not the mistress of provinces, but a brothel."

Ariosto, Canto 17.

O d'ogni vitio fetida fentina Dormi Italia imbriac-

"O incbriated Italy, thou sleepest the fink of every filthy vice."

And Petrarch;

Del'empia Babilonia, ond' è fuggita Ogni wergogna, ond' ogni bene è fuori, Albergo di dolor, madre d'errori Son fuggit' io per allungar la vita.

" From the impious Babylon (the Papal court) from whence all shame and all good are sled, the Inn of dolour, the mother of errors, have I hastened away to prolong my life."

A much

In vain to thee the call of glory founds,
Thy fword alone thy own foft bosom wounds.

Ah, Europe's fons, ye brother-powers, in you The fables old of Cadmus now are 'true: Fierce rose the brothers from the dragon teeth, And each fell crimson'd with a brother's death. So fall the bravest of the Christian name, While dogs unclean Messiah's lore blaspheme,

A much admired Sonnet from the fame Author shall close these citations.

SONNETTO.
La gola, el fonno, e l'otiofe piume
Hanno del mondo ogni viriù fbandita;
Ond' è dal corfo fuo quafi fmarrita
Nostra natura vinta dal cosiume:
Ed è si spento ogni benigno lume
Del ciel, per cui i informa bumana vita
Che per cosa mirabile i addita
Chi vuol sar d'Helicona nuscer siume
Qual vusghezza di lauro, qual di mirto?
Povera e nuda vai Filospia,
Dice la turba al vil guudugno intesa.
Pochi compagni havvai per l'alta via;
Tanto ti prego più; gentile spiito,
Non lossar la magnanima sua impresa.

Though this elegant little Poem is general, yet as the Author and the friend to whom he addresses it, were Italians, that he had a particular regard to the state of their own country must be allowed. I have thus attempted it in English.

SONNET.

Ah! how, my friend, has foul-gorged Luxurie,
And bloated flumbers on the flothful down,
From the dull world all manly virtue thrown,
And flaved the age to custom's tyrannie!

The bleffed lights to lost in darkness be, Those lights by heaven to guide our minds bestown, Mad were he deem'd who brought from Helicon The hallowed water or the laurel tree.

Philosophy, ah! thou art cold and poor, Exclaim the crowd, on fordid gain intent; Few will attend thee on thy lofty road: Yet I, my friend, would fire thy zeal the more; Ah, gentle spirit, labour on unspent, Crown thy fair toils, and win the smile of God.

It is supposed that this was addressed to a friend, engaged in some literary undertaking of importance and novelty.

f The fables old of Cadmus—Cadmus having slain the dragon which guarded the fountain of Dirce in Bootia, sowed the teeth of the monster. A number of armed men immediately sprung up, and surrounded Cadmus in order to kill him. By the counsel of Minerva he threw a precious stone among them, in striving for which they slew one another. Only five survived, who afterwards assisted him to build the city of Thebes. Vid. Ovid. Met. IV.

The foundation of this fable appears to be thus: Cadmus having flain a famous Freebooter, who infested Beotia, a number of his Banditti, not improperly called his teeth, attempted to revenge his death, but quarrelling about the presents which Cadmus sent them to distribute among themselves, they fell by the swords of each other Terrigenæ percunt per mutua vulnera fratres.

E So fall the brawest of the Christian name, While dogs u clean—Imitated from this fine passage in Lucan:

Quis furor. O Cives! quæ tanta licentia ferri, Gentibus irmifit Latium præbere cruorem? Cumque superba foret Bahylon spolianda tropbæis Ausoniis, umbraque erraret Crassos inulia, Belligeri placuit nulles babitura triumpbos? Heu, quantum potuit terræ polazique parari Hoe, quem civiles bauserunt, sanguine, dextræ!

And howl their curses o'er the holy tomb, As to the fword the Christian race they doom. From age to age, from shore to distant shore, By various princes led, their legions pour; United all in one determined aim, From every land to blot the Christian name. Then wake, ye brother-powers, combined awake; And from the foe the great example take. If empire tempt ye, lo, the east expands, Fair and immense her summer-garden lands: Here boastful wealth displays her radiant store, Pactol and Hermus' stream o'er golden ore, Rowl their long way; but not for you they flow, Their treasures blaze on the stern Soldan's brow: For him Assyria plies the loom of gold, And Afric's fons their deepest mines unfold To give his throne to blaze—Ye western powers, To throw the mimic bolt of Jove is yours, Yours all the art to wield the arms of fire, Then bid the thunders of the dreadful tire Against the walls of dread Byzantium roar, Till headlong driven from Europe's ravish'd shore To their cold Scythian wilds, and dreary dens, By Caspian mountains, and uncultured fens, Their fathers' feats beyond the Wolgian blake, The barbarous race of Saracen betake.

h Beyond the Wolgian lake—The Caspian sea, so called from the large river Volga or Wolga, which empties itself into it.

N n

And

276

And hark, to you the woeful Greek exclaims; The Georgian fathers and th' Armenian dames, Their fairest offspring from their bosoms torn, A dreadful tribute, loud imploring 'mourn. Alas, in vain! their offspring captive led, In Hagar's sons unhallow'd temples bred, To rapine train'd, arise a brutal host, The Christian terror, and the Turkish boast.

Yet sleep, ye powers of Europe, careless sleep,
To you in vain your eastern brethren weep;
Yet not in vain their woe-wrung tears shall sue,
Though small the Lusian realms, her legions sew,
The guardian oft by heaven ordain'd before,
The Lusian race shall guard Messiah's lore.
When heaven decreed to crush the Moorish soe
Heaven gave the Lusian spear to strike the blow.
When heaven's own laws o'er Afric's shores were heard,
The sacred shrines the Lusian heroes rear'd;
Nor shall their zeal in Asia's bounds expire,
Asia subdued shall sume with hallowed fire.
When the red sun the Lusian shore forsakes,
And on the lap of deepest west 'awakes,

¹ Their fairest offspring from their bosoms

A dreadful tribute!— By this barbarous policy the tyranny of the Ottomans has been long fuftained. The troops of the Turkish infantry and cavalry, known by the name of Janizaries and Spahis, are thus supported; and the scribes in office called Musti, says Sandys, "are the sons of Christians (and "those the most completely furnished by [&]quot; nature) taken in their childhood from

[&]quot;their miserable parents by a levy made every five years, or oftener or seldomer,

[&]quot; as occasion requireth."

The facred shrines the Lusian heroes rear'd—
See the note on page 104.

See the note on page 194.

1 — of deepest west — Alludes to the discovery and conquest of the Brazils by the Portuguese.

O'er the wild plains, beneath unincensed skies The fun shall view the Lusian altars rise. And could new worlds by human step be trod, Those worlds should tremble at the Lusian m nod.

m If our former defences of the exuberant declamations of Camoens are allowed by the critic, we doubt not but the digreffion, now concluded, will appear with pe-culiar propriety. The poet having brought his heroes to the shore of India, indulges himself with a review of the state of the western and eastern worlds; the latter of which is now, by the labour of his heroes, rendered accessible to the former. The purpose of his poem is also strictly kept in view. The West and the East he considers as two great empires, the one of the true religion, the other of a false. The profesfors of the true, disunited and destroying one another; the professors of the false one all combined to extirpate the other. He upbraids the professors of the true religion for their vices, particularly for their disunion and for deserting the interests of holy faith. His countrymen, however, he boafts, have been its defenders and planters, and, without the assistance of their brother powers, will plant it in Asia. This, as it is the purpose of his hero, is directly to the subject of the poem, and the honour, which heaven he fays vouchfafed to his countrymen, in chufing them to defend and propagate its laws, is in the genuine spirit of that religious enthufiasm which breathes through the two great epic poems of Greece and Rome, and which gives an air of the most solemn importance to the Gierusalemme of Tasso.

Yet whatever liberties a poet may be allowed to take when he treats of the fabulous ages, any abfurdity of opinion, where authentic history, and the state of modern nations afford the topic, must to the intelligent reader appear ridiculous, and therefore a blemish in a solemn poem. There are many, the translator is aware, to whom a serious and warm exhortation to a general crufade will appear as an absurdity, and a blemish of this kind. "The crusaders," according to what M. Voltaire calls their true character, des brigands ligues pour venir, &c. "were a band of vagabond thieves, " who had agreed to ramble from the heart " of Europe in order to desolate a country " they had no right to, and massacre, in " cold blood, a venerable prince more than fourfcore years old, and his whole peo-" ple, against whom they had no pretence " of complaint."

Yet however confidently Voltaire and others may please to talk, it will be no difficult matter to prove that the crusades were neither so unjustifiable, so impolitical, nor fo unhappy in their consequences as the superficial readers of history are habituated to view them.

Were the Aborigines of all' America to form one general confederacy against the descendants of those Europeans, who under that brutal conqueror Fernando Cortez, masfacred upwards of forty millions of Mexicans, and other American natives, and were the confederates totally to disposses the prefent possessors of an empire so unjustly acquired, no man, it is prefumed, would pronounce that their combination and hostilities were against the law of nature or nations. Yet, whatever Voltaire may pleafe to affert, this supposition is by no means unapplicable to the confederacy of the cross. A party of wandering Arabs are joined by the Turks or Turcomans, who inhabited the frozen wilds of mount Caucasus, and whose name fignifies wanderers; these, incorporated with other banditti, from the deferts of Scythia, now called Tartary, overrun the regions of Syria, to which they had no title, whose inhabitants had given them no offence. They profess that they are commissioned by heaven to establish the religion of Mohammed by violence and the fword. In a few ages they fubdue the finest countries around the Euphrates, and the Christian inhabitants, the rightful possesfors, are treated with the brutal policy and Nnz

And now their enfigns blazing o'er the tide On India's shore the Lusian heroes ride. High to the sleecy clouds resplendant far Appear the regal towers of Malabar, cruelty of a Cortez. Bound by their creed to make war on the Christians, their ambition neglects no opportunity to extend their conquests; and already possessed of immense territory, their acknowledged purpose and their power threaten destruction to the Christian empire of the Greeks.

Having conquered and profelited Africa, from the Nile to the Straits of Gibraltar, the princes of that country, their tributaries and allies, combining in the great design to extirpate Christianity, turn their arms against Europe, and are successful: they establish kingdoms in Spain and Portugal; and France, Italy, and the western islands of the mediterranean, fuffer by their excursions; while Hungary, Bohemia, Poland, and Italy itself, from its vicinage to Dalmatia, are immediately concerned in the impending fate of the Grecian empire. To these confiderations let it be added, that several eastern Christians sled to Europe, and begging as pilgrims from country to country, im-plored the assistance of the Christian powers to disposses the cruel and unjust usurpers of their lands. At this period the crusades commence. To suppose that the princes of Europe were so insensible to the danger which threatened them, as some modern writers who have touched upon that subject, appear to be, is to ascribe a degree of slupidity to them by no means applicable to their military character. Though superstition inflamed the multitude, we may be affured however, that feveral princes found it their political interest to fan the slames of that superstition; and accordingly we find that the princes of Spain and Portugal often greatly availed themselves of it. The immense resources which the Turks received from Egypt, and the neighbouring countries, which had not been attempted by Godfrey and the first crusaders, determined their fuccessors to alter the plan of their operations. They began their hostilities in Spain and Portugal, and proceeded through Barbary to Egypt. By this new route of the crosses, the Spaniards and Portuguese were enabled not only to drive the Moors from Europe, but to give a fatal blow to their power in Africa. Nor was the fafety of the Greek empire less necessary to Italy and the eastern kingdoms of Europe. Injuries, however, offered by the crusaders, who even seized the throne of Constantinople, upon which they placed an earl of Flanders, excited the refentment of the Greeks; and their aversion † to the papal supremacy ren-dered them so jealous of the crusaders, that the successors of Godfrey, for want of auxiliary support, after about ninety years posfession, were totally driven from their newerected kingdom in the Holy Land. By the fall of the Greek empire, an event which followed, and which had been long foreseen, the Venetians, the Austrians, the Poles, and the Russians became the natural enemies of the Turks; and many desperate wars, attended with various success, have been continued to the present time. Not much above fifty years ago, their formidable efforts to possess themselves of the Venetian dominions alarmed all the Christian powers; and had it not been for the repeated defeats they received from prince Eugene, a great part of the Austrian territories must have yielded to their yoke. However overlooked, it requires but little political philosophy to perceive the fecurity which would refult to Europe were there a powerful and warlike kingdom on the eastern side of the Turkish empire. The western conquests of that

p. 108.

† A Patriarch of Co flantinople declared publickly to the Pope's legate. "That he would much rather behold the turban then the triple crown upon the great alter of Conflantinople."

^{*} Lisbon itself was taken from the Moors, by the affistance of an English sect of crusaders. See the note, p. 108.

Imperial Calicut, the lordly feat
Of the first monarch of the Indian state.
Right to the port the valiant GAMA bends,
With joyful shouts a fleet of boats attends:

fierce warrior Bajazet I. were interrupted by Tamerlane, and by the enemy they found in Kouli Khan, the enraged Porte was prevented from revenging the triumphs of Eugene. A few years ago we beheld them trample on the law of nations, fend an ambassador to prison, and command the Russian empress to defert her allies. A war, which now continues, ensued. And however the forefight of the narrow politician may dread the rising power of the Russ, it is to be wished that the arms of Muscovy may fix fuch barriers to the Turkish empire as will for ever prevent their long meditated and often attempted defign to possess themselves of the Venetian dominions, or to extend their conquests on the West, conquests which would render them the most dangerous power to the peace of Europe.

In a word, the crusades, a combination which tended to support the Greek empire for the security of the eastern, and to drive the enemy from the fouthern parts of Europe, can by no means deserve to be called a most fingular monument of human folly, whatever the superstition of its promoters and conductors might be. And however the inutility and absurdity of their professed aim, to rescue the tomb of Christ, may excite the ridicule of the modern philosopher, it was a motive admirably adapted to the superstition of that age; and where it is necessary that an enemy should be restrained, an able politician will avail himself of the most powerful of all incitements to hostility, the superstitious or religious fervour of his army.

Having entered so far into the history of the crusades, it may not be improper to take a view of the happy consequences which stowed from them. "To these wild expeditions," says Robertson, "the effect of superstition or folly, we owe the first gleams of light which tended to dispel barbarity and ignorance, and introduce any change in government or manners." Constantinople, at that time the seat of elegance, of arts and commerce, was the principal rendezvous of the European armies. The Greek writers of that age speak of the Latins as the most ignorant barbarians; the Latins, on the other hand, talk with astonishment of the grandeur, elegance, and commerce of Constantinople. The most stupid barbarians, when they have the opportunity of comparison, are sensible of the superiority of civilized nations, and by an acquaintance with them begin to resemble their manners, and emulate their advan-tages. The fleets which attended the crosses introduced commerce, and the free-dom of commercial cities into their mother countries. This, as Robertson observes, proved destructive to the seudal system, which had now degenerated into the most gloomy oppression, and introduced the plans of regular government. "This acquisition "of liberty," fays the fame most ingenious historian, "made such a happy change in the condition of all the members of communities as roused them from that " stupidity and inaction into which they "had been sunk by the wretchedness of their former state. The spirit of industry " revived, commerce became an object of "attention, and began to flourish. Popu"lation increased. Independence was estab"lished, and wealth slowed into cities

"which had long been the seat of poverty
"and oppression."

Upon the whole it will be found, that the Portuguese poet talks of the political reasons of a crusade, with an accuracy in the philosophy of history, as superior to that of Voltaire as the poetical merit of the Lusiad surpasses that of the Henriade. And the critic in poetry must allow, that to suppose the discovery of Gama the completion of all the endeavours to overthrow the great enemies of the true religion gives a dignity to the poem, and an importance to the hero, similar to that which Voltaire, on the same supposition, allows to the subject of the Jerufalem of Tasso.

Joyful their nets they leave and finny prev. And crouding round the Lusians, point the way. A herald now, by Vasco's high command Sent to the monarch, treads the Indian strand; The facred staff he bears, in gold he shines, And tells his office by majestic signs. As to and fro, recumbent to the gale. The harvest waves along the yellow dale. So round the herald press the wondering throng, Recumbent waving as they pour along, And much his manly port and strange attire. And much his fair and ruddy hue admire: When speeding through the crowd with eager haste, And honest smiles, a son of Afric prest: Enrapt with joy the wondering herald hears Castilia's manly tongue salute his " ears. What friendly angel from thy Tago's shore Has led thee hither? cries the joyful Moor. Then hand in hand, the pledge of faith, conjoin'd, O joy beyond the dream of hope to find, To hear a kindred voice, the Lusian cried, Beyond unmeasured gulphs and seas untry'd:

Tunis, who, according to Osorius, had been the chief person with whom king Ferdinand had formerly contracted for military stores. He proved himself an honest agent, and of infinite service to Gama, with whom he returned to Portugal, where, according to Faria, he died in the Christian communion. He was named Monzaida.

Untry'd

This is according to the truth of history. While the messenger sent ashore by Gama was borne here and there, and carried off his feet by the throng, who understood not a word of his language, he was accosted in Spanish by a Moorish merchant, a native of Untry'd before our daring keels explored Our fearless way-Oh heaven, what tempests roared, While round the vast of Afric's southmost land Our eastward bowsprits sought the Indian strand. Amazed, o'erpower'd, the friendly stranger stood; A passage open'd through the boundless flood, The hope of ages, and the dread despair, Accomplish'd now, and conquer'd - stiff his hair Rose thrilling, while his labouring thoughts pursued The dreadful course by GAMA's fate subdued. Homeward, with generous warmth o'erflow'd, he leads The Lufian guest, and swift the feast succeeds; The purple grape and golden fruitage smile; And each choice viand of the Indian soil Heapt o'er the board, the master's zeal declare; The focial feast the guest and master share: The facred pledge of eastern faith 'approved, By wrath unalter'd, and by wrong unmoved. Now to the fleet the joyful herald bends, With earnest pace the heaven-fent friend attends:

the house, they met a crowd who carried the murdered corse of the nobleman's belo-ved son. The incensed populace demanded the murderer, who stood beside him, to be delivered to their sury. The father, though overwhelmed with grief and anger, replied, "We have eaten together, and I will not betray him." He protected the murderer of his fon from the fury of his domestics and neighbours, and in the night facilitated his escape.

o The facred pledge of eastern faith.—To eat together was in the east looked upon as the inviolable pledge of protection. As a Persian nobleman was one day walking in his garden, a wretch in the utmost terror prostrated himself before him, and implored. to be protected from the rage of a multitude who were in pursuit of him, to take his life. The nobleman took a peach, eat part of it, and gave the rest to the sugitive, asfuring him of fafety. As they approached

Now down the river's sweepy stream they glide, And now their pinnace cuts the briny tide: The Moor, with transport sparkling in his eyes, The well-known make of GAMA's navy spies, The bending bowsprit, and the mast so tall, The fides black frowning as a castle wall, The high-tower'd stern, the lordly nodding prore, And the broad standard slowly waving o'er The anchor's moony fangs. The skiff he leaves, Brave GAMA's deck his bounding step receives; And, Hail, he cries: in transport GAMA sprung, And round his neck with friendly welcome hung; Enrapt so distant o'er the dreadful main To hear the music of the tongue of Spain. And now beneath a painted shade of state Beside the Ammiral the stranger sate. Of India's clime, the natives, and the laws, What monarch sways them, what religion awes? Why from the tombs devoted to his fires The son so far? the valiant Chief enquires. In act to speak the stranger waves his hand, The joyful crew in filent wonder stand, Each gently pressing on with greedy ear, As erst the bending forests stoopt to hear In Rhodope, when Orpheus' heavenly strain, Deplored his lost Eurydice in vain;

P In Rbodope—The well-known fable of cond loss of his wife, is thus explained. Aëdoneus, king of Thesprotia, whose cruelty procured

While with a mien that generous friendship won From every heart, the Stranger thus begun:

Your glorious deeds, ye Lusians, well I know, To neighbouring earth the vital air I owe; Yet though my faith the Koran's lore revere; So taught my fires; my birth at proud Tangier, An hostile clime to Lisbon's awful name, I glow enraptured o'er the Lusian fame; Proud though your nation's warlike glories shine, These proudest honours yield, O Chief, to thine; Beneath thy dread atchievements low they fall, And India's shore, discovered, crowns them all. Won by your fame, by fond affection sway'd, A friend I come, and offer friendship's aid. As on my lips Castilia's language glows, So from my tongue the speech of India flows: Mozaide my name, in India's court beloved, For honest deeds, but time shall speak, approved. When India's Monarch greets his court again, For now the banquet on the tented q plain procured him the name of Pluto, tyrant of hell, having seized Eurydice, as she sted from his friend Aristæus, detained her as a captive. Orpheus having charmed the tyrant with his music, his wife was restored, on condition that he should not look upon her, till he had conducted her out of Thesprotia. Orpheus, on his journey, forseited the condition, and irrecoverably lost his spouse.

A For now the banquet on the tented plain, And fylwan chace his careless hours employ— The Great Mogul and other eastern sovereigns, attended with their courtiers, spend annually some months of the finest season in encampments in the field, in hunting parties, and military amusements.

And fylvan chace his careless hours employ; When India's Lord shall hail, with wondering joy, Your glad arrival on the spacious shore Through oceans never plough'd by keel before, Myself shall glad Interpreter attend, Mine every office of the faithful friend. Ah! but a stream, the labour of the oar, Divides my birth-place from your native shore; On shores unknown, in distant worlds, how sweet The kindred tongue the kindred face to greet! Such now my joy; and fuch, O heaven, be yours! Yes, bounteous heaven, your glad success secures. Till now impervious, heaven alone subdued The various horrors of the trackless flood; Heaven sent you here for some great work divine, And heaven inspires my breast your facred toils to join.

Vast are the shores of India's wealthful soil;
Southward sea-girt she forms a demi-isle:
His cavern'd cliffs with dark-brow'd forests crown'd,
Hemodian Taurus frowns her northern bound:
From Caspia's lake th' enormous mountain 'spreads,
And bending eastward rears a thousand heads;

Paropamissus, Orontes, Imaus, &c. and from Imaus extended through Tartary to the sea of Kamchatka.

r—th' enormous mountain.—Properly an immense chain of mountains, known by various names, Caucasus, Taurus, Hemodus,

Far to extremest sea the ridges thrown, By various names through various tribes are known: Here down the waste of Taurus' rocky side Two infant rivers pour the chrystal tide, Indus the one, and one the Ganges named, Darkly of old through distant nations famed: One castward curving holds his crooked way, One to the west gives his swoln tide to stray: Declining fouthward many a land they lave, And widely swelling roll the sea-like wave, Till the twin offspring of the mountain fire Both in the Indian deep ingulph'd expire: Between these streams, fair smiling to the day, The Indian lands their wide domains display, And many a league, far to the fouth they bend, From the broad region where the rivers end, Till where the shores to Ceylon's isle 'oppose, In conic form the Indian regions close. To various laws the various tribes incline, And various are the rites esteem'd divine:

after this voice, the king always cuts off people. To believe that this is the voice of the Devil these reasons urge; because there is no creature known to the inhabitants that cries like it, and because it will on a sudden depart from one place, and make a noise in another, quicker than any sowl can sly, and because the very dogs will tremble when they hear it; and it is so counted by all the people."—Knox, Hist. Ceyl p. 78.

^{* —}to Cezlen's ifle—One Captain Knox, who published an account of Ceylon, in 1681, has the following curious passage.

* This for certain, says he. I can affirm, that oftentimes the Devil doth cry with an audible voice in the night: It is very shrill, almost like the barking of a dog. This I have often heard myself, but never heard that he did any body any harm. Only this observation the inhabitants of the land have made of this voice, and I have made it also, that either just before, or very suddenly

Some as from heaven receive the Koran's lore, Some the dread monsters of the wild adore; Some bend to wood and stone the prostrate head, And rear unhallow'd altars to the dead. By Ganges' banks, as wild traditions 'tell, Of old the tribes lived healthful by the finell; No food they knew, such fragrant vapours rose Rich from the flowery lawns where Ganges flows: Here now the Delhian, and the fierce Patan Feed their fair flocks; and here, an heathen clan. Stern Decam's fons the fertile valleys till, A clan, whose hope to shun eternal ill, Whose trust from every stain of guilt to save, Is fondly placed in Ganges' holy " wave; If to the stream the breathless corpse be given They deem the spirit wings her way to heaven. Here by the mouths, where hallowed Ganges ends, Bengala's beauteous Eden wide extends, Unrivall'd smile her fair luxurious vales: And here Cambaya spreads her palmy " dales; imposed upon by some Greeks, who pretended to have been in India, relates this fable. Vid. Nat. Hift. Lib. 12.

" Is fendly placed in Ganges' holy wave—

ablutions are a gross imitation of that bap-

A warlike

Almost all the Indian nations attribute to the Ganges, the virtue of cleansing the soul from the stains of sin. They have such veneration for this river, that if any one in their presence were to throw any filth into the stream, an instant death would punish his audacity. As St. Thomas preached the faith in the east, it is probable that these tism, which he published. Castera.

 And here Cambaya—Now called Gazarate. The inhabitants are ingenious, cultivate letters, and are faid to be particularly happy in the agreeable Romance. According to ancient tradition, Porus was sovereign of this country. His memory is still pre-ferved with an eclat, worthy of that valour and generosity which attracted the esteem of the great Alexander. Castera. This country was known to the ancients by the name of Gedrosia.

A warlike realm, where still the martial race
From Porus famed of yore their lineage trace.

Narsinga * here displays her spacious line,
In native gold her sons and ruby shine:
Alas, how vain! these gaudy sons of fear,
Trembling, bow down before each hostile spear.

* Narfinga—The laws of Narfinga oblige the women to throw themselves into the funeral pile, to be burnt with their deceased husbands. An infallible secret to prevent the desire of widowhood. Castera from Barros, Dec. 4.

There are many accounts in different travellers of the performance of this most barbarous ceremony. The following one is felected as the most picturesque of any in the knowledge of the translator.

" At this time (1710) died the Prince of Marata, aged above eighty years. The ceremony of his funeral, where his forty-feven wives were burned with his corpie, was thus: A deep circular pit was digged in a field without the town; in the middle of the trench was erected a pile of wood, on the top of which, on a couch richly ornamented, lay the body of the deceased Prince in his finest robes. After numberless rituals performed by the Bramins, the pile was fet on fire, and immediately the unhappy Ladies appeared, sparkling with jewels and adorned with flowers. These victims of this diabolical facrifice walked feveral times about the burning pile, the heat whereof was felt at a considerable distance. The principal Lady then, holding the dagger of her late huf-band, thus addressed herself to the Prince his successor: Here, said she, is the dagger which the King made use of, to triumph over his enemies: beware never to employ it to other purpose, never to embrue it with the blood of your subjects. Govern them as a father, as he has done, and you shall live long and happy, as he did. Since he is no more, nothing can keep me longer in the world; all that remains for me is to follow him. With these words, she resigned the dagger into the Prince's hands, who took it from her without shewing the least fign of grief or compassion. The Princess now appeared agitated. One of her domestics, a Christian woman, had frequently talked with her on religion, and though she never renounced her idols, had made some impressions on her mind. Perhaps these impressions now revived. With a most expreffive look she exclaimed, Alas! what is the end of human happiness! I know I shall plunge myself headlong into hell. On these words, a horror was visible on every countenance; when resuming her courage, she boldly turned her face to the burning pile, and calling upon her gods, flung herfelf into the midft of the flames. The fecond Lady was the fifter of a Prince of the blood, who was present, and assisted at the detestable facrifice. She advanced to her brother, and gave him the jewels, wherewith she. was adorned. His passion gave way, he burst into tears, and fell upon her neck in the most tender embraces. She, however, remained unmoved, and, with a resolute countenance, fometimes viewed the pile, and fometimes the affiftants. Then loudly exclaiming, Chiva, Chiva, the name of one of her idols, she precipitated herself into the flames, as the former had done. The other Ladies soon followed aster, some decently composed, and some with the most bewildered, down-cast, sorrowful looks. One of them, shocked above the rest, ran to a Christian foldier, whom she beheld among the guards, and hanging about his neck, implored him to fave her. The new convert, stunned with surprize, pushed the unfortunate Lady from him; and shricking aloud she fell into the fiery trench. The foldier, all shivering with terror, immediately retired, and a delirious fever ended his life in the following night. Though many of the unhappy victims, discovered at first the ut-

And now behold; - and while he fpoke he rose, Now with extended arm the prospect shews, Behold these mountain-tops of various fize Blend their dim ridges with the fleecy skies; Nature's rude wall, against the fierce Canar They guard the fertile lawns of Malabar. Here from the mountain to the furgy main, Fair as a garden spreads the smiling plain: And lo, the Empress of the Indian powers, There lofty Calicut resplendent towers; Her's every fragrance of the spicy shore, Her's every gem of India's countless store: Great Samoreem, her Lord's imperial style, The mighty Lord of India's utmost soil: To him the kings their duteous tribute pay, And at his feet confess their borrow'd sway. Yet higher tower'd the monarchs ancient, boaft, Of old one fovereign ruled the spacious coast.

most intrepidity, yet no sooner did they seed the slames, than they roared out in the most dreadful manner; and, weltering over each other, strove to gain the brim of the pit; but in vain: the assistants forced them back with their poles, and heaped new suel upon them. The next day the Branus gathered the bones, and threw them into the sea. The pit was levelled, a temple built on the spot, and the deceased Prince and his wives were reckoned among the Deitics. To conclude, this detestable cruelty has the appearance of the free choice of the women. But that freedom is only specious; it is almost impossible to avoid it. If they do, they must be under perpetual infamy, and the relations, who esteem themselves highly disgraced, leave no means untried to oblige them to it. Princesses, and Concubines of Princes, however, are the only persons from whom this species of suicide is expected. When women of inserior rank submit to this abominable custom, they are only urged to it by the impulse of a barbarous pride and vanity of ostentation." Extracted from a letter from Father Martin, on the mission of Coromandel, to Father de Villete, of the Society of Jesus, published at Paris, in 1719.

10 celd one sovereign ruled the specieus coast——Whatever Monzaida relates of the people and their manners, is consirmed by the histories of India, according to Barros.

A votive train, who brought the Koran's lore, What time great Perimal the sceptre bore, From blest Arabia's groves to India came; Life were their words, their eloquence a flame Of holy zeal: fired by the powerful strain The lofty monarch joins the faithful train, And vows, at fair Medina's shrine, to close His life's mild eve in prayer and sweet repose. Gifts he prepares to deck the Prophet's tomb, The glowing labours of the Indian loom, Orixa's spices and Golconda's gems; Yet, ere the fleet th' Arabian ocean stems. His final care his potent regions claim, Nor his the transport of a father's name; His fervants now the regal purple wear, And high enthroned the golden sceptres bear. Proud Cochim one, and one fair Chalé sways, The spicy Isle another Lord obeys; Coulam and Cananoor's luxurious fields, And Cranganore to various Lords he yields. While these and others thus the monarch graced, A noble youth his care unmindful past: Save Calicut, a city poor and small, Though lordly now, no more remain'd to fall:

Castaneda, Masseus, and Don Osorius. Our Author, in this, imitates Homer and Virgil, who are fond of every opportunity to introduce any curious custom or vestige of antiquity. Castera.

Grieved

Grieved to behold fuch merit thus repay'd, The fapient youth the king of kings he made, And honour'd with the name, great Samoreem, The lordly titled boast of power supreme. And now great Perimal refigns his reign, The blissful bowers of Paradise to gain: Before the gale his gaudy navy flies, And India finks for ever from his eyes. And foon to Calicut's commodious port The fleets, deep-edging with the wave, refort: Wide o'er the shore extend the warlike piles, And all the landscape round luxurious smiles. And now her flag to every gale unfurl'd, She towers the Empress of the eastern world: Such are the bleffings fapient kings bestow, And from thy stream such gifts, O Commerce, slow.

From that fage youth, who first reign'd king of kings, He now who sways the tribes of India springs. Various the tribes, all led by fables vain, Their rites the dotage of the dreamful brain. All, save where Nature whispers modest care, Naked, they blacken in the sultry air. The haughty nobles and the vulgar race Never must join the conjugal embrace;

Nor may the stripling, nor the blooming maid, Oh lost to joy, by cruel rites betray'd! To spouse of other than their father's art, At Love's connubial shrine unite the heart: Nor may their fons, the genius and the view Confined and fetter'd, other art pursue. Vile were the stain, and deep the foul difgrace, Should other tribe touch one of noble race; A thousand rites, and washings o'er and o'er, Can scarce his tainted purity restore. Poleas the labouring lower clans are named: By the proud Nayres the noble rank is claimed; The toils of culture, and of art they fcorn, The warrior's plumes their haughty brows adorn; The shining faulchion brandish'd in the right, Their left arm wields the target in the fight; Of danger scornful, ever arm'd they stand Around the king, a stern barbarian band. Whate'er in India holds the facred name Of piety or lore, the Brahmins claim: In wildest rituals, vain and painful, lost, Brahma their founder as a God they boast 2.

thers. The story of Calanus, who burnt himself in the camp of Alexander, is well known. The Brahmin Mandanis, however, deserves more honour: he rejected with scorn the gifts of the conqueror, and ridiculed his pretensions to divinity. Several ambassadors were sent by a king of India, a king of standard kings, to Augustus Cæsar. (Sueton. c. 21.) One of these, a Brahmin philosopher. Burned himself at Athens. His life

Brahma their founder as a god they boast.

Antiquity has talked much, but knew little with certainty of the Brahmins, and their philosophy. Porphyry and others esteem them the same as the Gymnosophists of the Greeks, and divide them into several sects, the Samanæi, the Germanes, the Pramnæ, the Gymnetæ, &c. Their terrible penances are often mentioned by heathen authors, and by the earliest of the Christian fa-

To crown their meal no meanest life expires,

Pulse, fruit, and herbs alone their board requires:

Alone in lewdness riotous and free,

No spoulal ties with-hold, and no degree:

thad been extremely prosperous, and he took this method, he said, to prevent a reverse of fortune. Amid a great concourse of people he entered the fire, naked, anointed, and langhing. The epitaph which he desired might be inscribed on his tomb, was, " Here rests Zarmanochagas, the Indian of Bargosa, who, according to the custom of his country, made himself immortal." On the approach of age or difease, according to antiquity, they had recourse to this means, and it was on the advances of a distemper that Calanus amused Alexander with this exhibition of Indian philosophy. The custom of the wife being burned with the corpse of her deceased husband is also very antient. It is mentioned by Hierome, (Adv. Jov. l. i.) and several others. Postellus (de Orig. c. 13. et 15.) fancies that the Brahmins are descended of Abraham by Keturah, and named Brachmanes, quasi Abrahmanes. Pliny, I. vii. c. 2. relates, that the Indian philosophers called Gymnetæ, from the fun rifing to his fetting, by way of divi-nation, kept their eyes unalterably fixed on the orb of that luminary. Besides these relations, which correspond with later acscounts, the antients had innumerable fables. Pliny talks of men in India with dogs heads; others with only one leg, yet Achilleses for · swiftness of foot; of a nation of pigmies; of some, (as already observed in these notes) who lived by the smell; of tribes who had only one eye in their forehead; and of fome whose ears hung down to the ground. Others talked of fountains, in India, of liquid gold. But enough. Though Pliny, no doubt, had his admirers, these stories were ridiculed by some, and Horace genteely Maughs at them in a single expression.

> -Quæ loca fabulosus Lambit Hydasses.

From the earliest times the Indians have been divided into distinct tribes. The four principal ones are, the Prahmins, (who like the Levites among the Hebrews, are hereditary priests) the foldiers, the mechanics, and the labourers. As these tribes never intermarry, India may properly be faid to contain four different nations. They will neither eat together, nor drink out of the same vessel. If they trespass in these or in many other fimilar points, they are held as polluted, rejected from their tribe, and are obliged to herd with a despised crew, called the Hallachores, who are the lowest of the community, the rabble of India. Among these only, fays Scrafton, the popish missionaries have had any success. Urbano Cerri, in his account of the Catholic religion, mentions a Jesuit named Robertus de Nobili, who preached that every one ought to remain in his own tribe, and by that means made many converts. He also proposed to erect a seminary of Christian Brahmins. But the Holy See disapproved of this rational design, and defeated his labours. Jealoufy of the fecular arts of the Portuguese, was also a powerful preventive of the labours of their A Spaniard being asked by an Indian king, how his Spanish majesty was able to subdue such immense countries as they boasted to belong to him: The Don honeftly answered, "that he first sent priests to convert the people, and having thus gained a party of the natives, he fent fleets and foldiers, who with the affistance of the new profelites subdued the rest." The truth of this confession, which has been often proved, will never be forgotten in the East. But if the bigotted adherence of the Indians to the rites of their tribes, and other causes, have been a bar to the propagation of Christianity among them, the fame reasons have also prevented the success of Mohammedisin, a religion much more palatable to the luxurious and ignorant. Though the Mogul, and almost all the princes of India, have these many centuries professed the religion of the Koran, Mr. Ornie computes that all the Mehammedans of Hindostan do not exceed

Lost to the heart-ties, to his neighbour's arms The willing husband yields his spouse's charms: In unendear'd embraces free they blend; Yet but the husband's kindred may ascend mille on ten thousand; whereas the Indians, he says, amount to about an hundred millions.

Almost innumerable, and sometimes as whimfically abfurd as the Arabian Nights' Entertainments, are the holy legends of India. The accounts of the god Brahma, or Brimha, are more various than those of any fable in the Grecian mythology. According to Father Bohours, in his life of Xavier, the Brahmins hold, that the Great God having a desire to become visible, became man. In this state he produced three sons, Mayso, Visnu, and Brahma; the first, born of his mouth, the fecond, of his breast, the third, of his belly. Being about to return to his invisibility, he assigned various departments to his three sons. To Brahma he gave the third heaven, with the superintendence of the rites of religion. Brahma having a desire for children, begot the Brahmins, who are the priests of India, and who are believed by the other tribes to be a race of demi-gods, who have the blood of heaven running in their veins. Other accounts say, that Brahma produced the priests from his head, the more ignoble tribes from his breast, thighs, and feet.

According to the learned Kircher's account of the theology of the Brahmins, the fole and supreme god Vistnou, formed the secondary god Brahma, out of a flower that floated on the surface of the great deep besore the creation. And afterwards, in reward of the virtue, fidelity, and gratitude of Brahma, gave him power to create the universe.

According to the Danish missionaries*, the First Being, say the Brahmins, begat Eternity, Eternity begat Tschinen, Tschinen begat Tschaddy, Tschaddy begat Putady, or the elementary world, Putade begat Sound, Sound begat Nature, Nature begat the great god Tschatatschinen, from whom Brahma was the fourth in a like descent. Brahma produced the foul, the foul produced the visible heaven, the heaven produced the air, the air the fire, the fire the water, and the water the earth. A legend fomething similar to this appears in Mr. Dow's Dissertation on the Brahmins, prefixed to his ingenious history of Hindostan.

This genealogical nonsense, however, is not confined to India. Hefiod's genealogy of the gods, though refined upon by the schools of Plato, is of the same class. The Jewish fables, foolish questions and genea-logies, reproved by faint Paul, (epist. Tit.) were probably of this kind, for the Talmudical legends were not then sprung up. Binab, or Understanding, said the cabalists, begat Cechmah, or Wisdom, &c. till at last comes Mileab, the Kingdom, who begat Shekinab, the Divine Presence. In the same manner the Christian Gnostics, of the sect of Valentinus, held their Πλήρωμα, and their thirty ages. Ampfiu and Auraan, they tellus, i. e. Profundity and Silence, begat Bacua and Thartbun, Mind and Truth; these begat Ubucua and Thardeadie, Word and Life, and these Merexa and Atarbarba, Man and Church. The other conjunctions of their thirty Æones are of similar ingenuity. The prevalence of the same spirit of mythological allegory in fuch different nations, affords the philosopher a worthy field of spe-

Almost as innumerable as their legends are the dreadful penances to which the religionists of India submit themselves for the expiation of fins. Some hold the transmigration of fouls, and of consequence abstain from all animal food 1. Yet however austere in other respects, they freely abandon them-

^{*} See Phillips's Collection of their Letters published at London in 1717.

† Though from the extracts given by Mr. Dow, the philosopher Goutam appears to have been a very Duns Scotus or Aquinas in metaphysics, the Pythagorean reason why the Brahmins abstain from animal food, is a convincing proof of their ignorance in natural philosophy. Some will let vermin ever-run them; some of the Banians cover their mouth with a cloth, least they should fuck in a gnat with their breath; and some carefully sweep the floor eve they tread upon it, less they dislodge the foul of an infect. And yet they do not know that in the water that drink, and in great following the country that in the water that drink, and in great following the country that in the water that drink. do not know that in the water they drink, and in every falled they eat, they cause the death of innumerable living creatures.

The nuptial couch: alas, too bleft, they know Nor jealoufy's suspence, nor burning woe; The bitter drops which oft from dear affection flow.

felves to every species of letchery, some of them esteeming the most unnatural abo-minations as the privilege of their fanctity. The cow they venerate as facred. If a dying man can lay hold of a cow's tail t, and expire with it in his hands, his foul is fure to be purified, and perhaps will enjoy the fignal favour to transmigrate into the body of one of those animals. The temples of India, which are numerous, are filled with innumerable idols of the most horrid figures. Brahma, in particular, appears in many forms: in one as a fat old man, fitting cross-legged, with four faces, and four hands. A species of the antient manicheeism of Persia is mixed with their religion, and the Destroyer, or the Frightful Demon, is worshipped by the authority of their sacred books. The first thing they meet in the morning, be it ass, hog, or dog, they worship during the course of the day. Scarcely more stupid were the Pelusians. Crepitus ventris inflati, says Hierome, Pelusiaca religio eft. The Brahmins are allowed to eat nothing but what is cooked by themselves. Astrology is their principal study; yet, though they are mostly a despicable set of sortune-tellers, some of them are excellent moralists, and particularly inculcate the comprehensive virtue of humanity, which is enforced by the opinion, that Divine Beings often assume the habit of mendicants, in order to distinguish the charitable from the inhuman. The Malabrians have feveral traditions of the virtuous on these happy trials being translated into heaven; the best designed incitement to virtue, perhaps, which their religion contains. Besides the Brahmins, the principal sect of that vast region called India, there are feveral others, who are divided and fubdivided, according to innumerable variations in every province. In Cambaya, the Banians, a fect who strictly abstain from all animal food, are numerous.

Such are the general accounts of the Indian opinions, which till lately have been received in Europe. Accounts much more to the honour of the Indian philosophy have within these few years been laid before the public, by some gentlemen, who, by conversing with some eminent Brahmins, have enjoyed the best opportunities of information. Yet these gentlemen do not agree among themselves. Colonel Dow confesses, that he finds himself obliged to differ from Mr. Holwell almost in every particular concerning the religion of the Hindoos "The Bedang or Shafter, the facred book of the Brahmins, fays Dow, con-tains various accounts of the creation, " one philosophical, the others allegorical. "These latter, says he, have afforded ample " field for the invention of the Brahmins. " From the many allegorical systems of " creation contained in the Shafters, many " different accounts of the cosmogony of the " Hindoos have been promulgated in Eu-" rope, some travellers adopting one system, fome another." From this consession we are led to infer, that the different accounts given by our modern travellers, arise from their having conversed with different Brahmins; a circumstance by no means favourable to the opinion of the confishency of the moral and philosophically religious system, which we have been told is contained in the facred books of India. If we cannot be so warm in our admiration of the religious philosophy of the Hindoos, as some late writers have been, some circumstances of that philofophy, as delivered by themselves, it is hoped, will exculpate our coolness.

The facred books of the Hindoos are written in a dead language, the Sanscrita, which none but the Brahmins are allowed to study. So strict in this are they, says Mr. Dow, that only one Musselman was ever instructed in it, and his knowledge was obtained by fraud. Mahummud Akbart, emperor of India, though bred a Mohammedan, studied several religions. In the christian he was instructed by a Portuguese. But finding that of the Hindoos inaccessible, he ¹ Bohours.

This Akbar chose, as his last and best religion, to worship the sun. While he performed his public devoirs to that bright deity, he himfelf, by his own order, was worthipped by the crowd below. See Grinftone.

But should my lips each wond'rous scene unfold, Which your glad eyes will foon amazed behold, Oh, long before the various tale could run, Deep in the west would fink yon eastern sun.

had recourse to art. A boy of parts, named Feizi, was, as the orphan of a Brahmin, put under the care of one of the most eminent of these philosophers, and obtained full knowledge of their hidden religion. But the fraud being discovered, he was laid under the restraint of an oath, and it does not appear that he ever communicated the knowledge thus acquired.

True or false, this story, which is firmly believed in Hindostan, sufficiently shews the great care with which they conceal their tenets, of which even the Mohammedans, their masters, have little or no knowledge. Different from every other fect, the Brahmins admit of no profelites, a circumstance of unparallelled policy. Some may venerate, on this account, the wisdom and facredness of their doctrines. For our part we cannot help being led, by this very cue, to suspect that there is something extremely absurd, frivolous, and childish, in what is thus religiously enveloped in the veil of darkness. Were analogy allowed us in proof, our suspicion would amount to an affertion. The facred books, or Shafters, are divided into four Bedas; the first contains principally the science of divination, the fecond treats of religious and moral duties, the third the rites of religion, facrifices, penances, &c. and the fourth, the knowledge of the Good Being; and contains, fays our author, the whole science of theology and metaphysical philosophy.

Thus, according to Mr. Dow, the Brahmins avow, and their facred book contains, that most despicable of all pretensions to learning, judicial astrology; that mother of superstition in every country, that engine of villany, by which the prices of India, and the gypsies of England, impose on the credulous and ignorant. Nor can we pass unobserved the rejection of the fourth Beda. By its subject it seems to be the most valuable of the whole, except the second. Yet the Brahmins, says Mr. Dow, have long rejected it, because the Mohammedan religion, they fay, is borrowed from it. On the supposition, which they pretend, that their facred books were dictated by divine authority, the rejection of any part is as unwarrantable as the reason for rejecting the fourth Beda is submissive and ridiculous. Another shrewd suspicion from this also arises. The Brahmins reject a fourth part of their facred canon, and they have ever kept the whole most carefully concealed from the eyes of every enquirer. Who, that considers these circumstances, can heartily believe the pretended antiquity or the unadulterated text of the facred records of India?

A philosopher, named Goutam, who lived about 4000 years ago, is acknowledged to have written many of the treatifes which are held facred by the Neadirfen sect; a sect, whose doctrines are professed by the generality of the Brahmins of Bengal, and of the northern provinces. "This philosopher, fays " Mr. Dow, supposes that the Deity never " exerts the power of a providence, but that " he remains in eternal rest, taking no con-" cern neither in human affairs, nor in the " course of the operations of Nature." This may be called philosophy, but this article in the creed of Goutam is incompatible with the idea of religion, the philosophical definition of which is certainly thus, A dependence on the Creator, similar to that of a Child on his Father.

" The learned Brahmins says the Colo-" nel, with one voice, deny the existence " of inferior divinities. Their polytheism " is only a symbolical worship of the divine " attributes, and it is much to be doubted, " whether the want of revelation and philosophy, those necessary purifiers of religion, ever involved any nation in gross " idolatry, as many ignorant zealots have "pretended."...." Under the name of " Brimha, they worship the wisdom and cre-" ative power of God; under the appellation " of Bishen, his providential and preserving quality; and under that of Shibah, that " attribute which tends to destroy."

" Shibah, fays the fame author, among inany others, is known by the names of 44 Mahoissur,

In few, all wealth from China to the Nile, All balfams, fruit, and gold on India's bosom smile.

While thus the Moor his faithful tale reveal'd, Wide o'er the coast the voice of Rumour swell'd;

" Mahoissur, the Great Demon; Bamdebo, the Frightful Spirit; and Mohilla, the " Destroyer."

The same authority also informs us, that they erect temples to Granesh, or Policy, whom they worship at the commencement of any design, represented with the head of an elephant with only one tooth. That they worship Kartic, or Fame; Cobere, or Wealth; Soorage, or the sun; Chunder, or the moon; the deities of water, sire, &c. besides an innumerable herd of local divinities. In another place, our author confesses that the vulgar revere all the elements, and receive as an article of belief every holy legend.

An account of the celebrated sect of the Brahmins, and an enquiry into their philosophy, are undoubtedly requisite in the notes of a Poem which celebrates the discovery of the Eastern World; of a poem where their rites and opinions are necessarily mentioned. To set the subject in the clearest and most just view, as far as his abilities will serve him, is the intention of the translator. The admirers of the Hindoos philosophy will therefore excuse him, should he venture to give his opinion against the apology for the polytheism of the Brahmins. To call it only a symbolical worship of the Divine Attributes, is only to prefent to us a specious shadow, which will vanish on the slightest touch of examination.

That the polytheism of Egypt, the worship of dogs, crocodiles, and onions, was only a symbolical worship of the divine attributes, has been often faid, and with equal justice. For our part we can distinguish no difference between the worship of Janus with two faces, or of Brahma with four. The philosophers of Rome were as able to allegorife as those of India. The apology for the idolatry of the Brahmins is applicable to that of every nation, and, as an argument, falls nothing short of that of a learned Arab, who about the eleventh century wrote a treatife to prove that there never was such a thing as idolatry in the world, for that every man intended to worship some attribute of the divinity, which he believed to reside in his idol.

Nor is a fentiment of Mr. Dow inapplicable to this: "Let us rest assured, says he, "that whatever the external ceremonies of religion may be, the self same infinite Being is the object of universal adoration." Yet whatever the metaphysician may think of this ingenious resincement, the moral philosopher will be little pleased with it, when he considers that the vulgar, that is ninety-nine of every hundred, are utterly incapable of practising their idolatry, according to this philosophical definition.

^{*} Perimal, who, according to some of their holy legends, was the son of acow, was worshipped as a god in the kingdom of Narsinga. Near the city of Preset was a wood full of apes, esteemed of a divine race, and of the houshold of Perimal, in whom some thousands of the gods had taken refuge. In the city of Cidambaram was a stately temple erected to one of these apes, named HANIMANT. Being threatened with some danger, Hanimant put himself at the head of many thousand of his brother gods, and led them to the sea side; where sinding no ship, he took a leap into the ocean, and an island immediately rose under his feet. At every leap the miracle was repeated, and in this manner he brought his divine brotherhood all safe to the island of Ceylon. A tooth of Hanimant was kept there as a facred relick, and many pilgrimages were made to visit it. In 1554, the Portuguese made a descent on that island, and among other things seized the holy tooth. The indian princes (say Linschnten, c. 44.) offered 700,000 ducats in ranssm, but by the persuasion of the archbishop, the Portuguese viceroy burned it in the presence of the Indian ambassadors. A Banian, however, had the art to persuade his countrymen that he was invisibly present when the Portuguese burnt the tooth, that he had secreted the holy one, and put another in its place, which was the one committed to the slames. His story was believed, says our author, and the king of Bisnagar gave him a great sum for a tooth which he produced as the facred relick. The striking resemblance which this sable of the apes bears to the Egyptian mythology, which tells us that their gods had taken refuge in dogs, ctocodiles, onions, srogs, and even in cleacis, is worthy of observation.

As first some upland vapour seems to float

Small as the smoke of lonely shepherd cot,

Soon o'er the dales the rolling darkness spreads,

And wraps in hazy clouds the mountain heads,

That the 'learned Brahmins with one voice affert there is but one Supreme God, has been acknowledged by almost all modern travellers. Xavier himself confesses this, and tells us from the authority of a Brahmin, that the ten commandments made a part.of their hidden religion. But be their bidden religion what it will, the Brahmins, in public, worship and teach the worship of idols. To give an account both of the popular and what is called the philosophical religion of India, is the purpose of this essay. To ab-Atract our view therefore from the popular practice of the country, and to indulge the spirit of encomium on the enlarged tenets of the learned few, is not here to be expected. To follow this method, a traveller may tell us there is no popery at Rome, or that the divine mission of Mohammed is denied at :Constantinople, because at the one he conrverfed with a deistical Bishop, or at the other with a philosophical Mufti. However pleased rtherefore the metaphysician may be with incenious refinement, the moralist will confider, that the question is not, how the philosopher may refine upon any system, but how the people will, of consequence, practise under its influence. And on this view alone, he will pronounce it reprehensible or commendable. That the religion of the Brahmins is highly reprehenfible every moralist must allow, when he considers, that the most unworthy ideas of the Divinity, ideas destructive of morality, naturally arite from idol worship; and the vulgar, it is every where confessed, cannot avoid the abuse. What can he think of the epiety of a poor superstitious Indian, when he worships the Great Dæmon, the Destroyer, and Frightful Spirit? Does he love what he worships? And can piety exist where the object of adoration is hated? What can the moralist think of the Indian, who, upon religious principles, drowns himself in the Ganges, or throws himself under the wheels of his pagod's chariot, to be crushed to death by the holy load? The duties we owe to our relatives in particular, and to fociety in general, the Author of Nature has imposed upon us by an indispensible canon. Yet these duties by the pious suical are refused on the principles of the weakest superstition. Nor can the moralist view the dreadful austerities to which the Brahmin philosophers submit themselves in any other light. He who fixes his eyes on his nose till he can see in no other direction; he who clenches his fift till the nails grow out at the back of his hand; and he who twists his neck about, till his face is fixed unalterably backward; (three modes of penance mentioned by Mr. Dow) and he who drowns himself at once, equally incapacitate themselves for the duties of society. Nor ought other parts of the Brahmin superstition, in our examination of their tenets and practises, to be here omitted. From the concurrent accounts of many travellers who understood their language, and converfed with the Brahmins, among many other most absurd rites, we are informed that they pay a superstitious regard, and ascribe great holiness to the ashes of burned cowdung; that they perfuade the people that their idols eat and drink, and for this purpose extort contributions from the multitude; and for this purpose too, prostitution is enjoyned, and the price of it received from the hands of poor women. If all this is not gross ido-latry, nothing ever transacted on earth can deferve the name.

If we may be allowed to digress a little from the subject of the Brahmins, the suti-

Ahraham Roger, in particular. He lived fifteen years among the Brahmins, and was in intimate friendhip with one of them, named Pudmanaba. He seturned to Holland in 1647, where he published his writings, which prove him to have been a learned man, and a diligent enquirer. Of his good fense let one eletiment bear testimony. "Can we believe, says he, that there is a generous spirit residing in a people who for two or three, thousand years have placed the greatest degree of fancity and prudence in half starving themselves, and in depriving themselves of the lawful conveniencies of life? Yet such aussertica were the chief employments of the ancient Brackmana, and are now of the modern Brankings."
Lity

The leafless forest and the utmost lea;
And wide its black wings hover o'er the sea:
The tear-dropt bough hangs weeping in the vale,
And distant navies rear the mist-wet sail.

lity of our refined apology for idolatry will still appear in a stronger light. What will the definition avail in the ballance of morality, when all the inhuman, impure, and immoral rites of idolatry are laid in the other scale? Palestine, Tyre, and Carthage made their children " pass through the fire unto " Moloch;" and human facrifices have prevailed at one time or other in every land. No philosophers ever entertained sublimer ideas of the Divinity, and of the human foul, than the antient Druids. Yet what shall we think of the Wicker Man! A gigantic figure! the body, each leg and arm was a mast, to which an hundred or more human victims were bound with wicker. When there was a deficiency of malefactors or prisoners of war, the innocent helpless were feized, that the horrid facrifice might be complete. When all the rites were performed, the fublime Druids gave the hecatomb to the flames, us an offering grateful to their gods, as the affurance of protection. In the most polished ages of antient Greece and Rome, the rites of religion were often highly immoral, basely impure. To mention any particular would be an infult to the scholar. Impurities which make the blood recoil, which, like Swift, make one detest the Yahoo species, are a part of the religious externals of many barbarous tribes. A citation from Baumgarten's travels, as quoted by Mr. Locke, here offers itself. "In"fuper sanctum illum, quem eo loco [in Egyft] vidimus, publicitus apprimé com-" mendari, eum esse hominem fanctum, " divinum à integritate præcipuum; eo " quod, nec fæminarum unquam effet, " nec puerorum, fed tantummodo afela-" rum cuncubitor atque mularum." Decency will allow no translation of this. In a word, where idolatry is practifed, whether in the churches of Rome, or in the temples of Brahma, the confequences are felt, and a remedy is wanted: the vulgar are gross idolators; the wifer part fee the cheat, and become almost indifferent to every tie of religion.

To all this let it be added, that as Mr. Holwell's and Mr. Dow's Brahmins did not give the same accounts of their hidden religion to these gentlemen; so it is an observation founded on experience, that the zealot of any fect, in giving an account of his religion to one who knows nothing about it, will give every circumstance the best gloss, and strain every feature, as much as possible, to a conformity to the ideas of his intelligent friend. In this manner Josephus, a man of great abilities, wrote his history of the Jews. He has altered, suppressed, glossed, and falfified, on purpose to adopt the manners and opinions of his countrymen, as much as possible, to the taste of the Greek and Roman philosophers. In the same manner, we believe, it may be afferted, that every jefuit behaves, when he defends popery in conversation with an intelligent diffenter from the church of Rome, who has the art to appear ignorant of the doctrines of the papacy, and of the writers of that communion. One may often meet with a fensible papist, who either from ignorance of the history of his own religion, or from prejudice in its favour, will very confidently deny the horrid cruelties, superstitions, and villanous arts of Holy Church; those intrigues and transactions which form the principal part of the history of Europe during fix or seven monkish centuries. Yet what wise man will upon fuch evidence reject the testimony of ages. The allusion is apt, and the inference is the same. Every one, who is acquainted with the history of the human mind, knows what an alteration in the manners of that most bigotted people the Jews, was introduced by the Babylonian captivity. Before that period amazingly dull and stupid, after their return from Assyria they began to philofophize. The superstition and idolatry of

To have represented the Devil on a neighbouring mountain, delighted with the yells and steam of this facrifice, would have been an incident worthy of the Paradife Lost, and might have come in excellent place, had the great author continued the visions of the eleventh, in place of the far inserior narrative of the twelfth book.

So Fame increasing, loud and louder grew, And to the sylvan camp resounding slew; A lordly band, she cries, of warlike mien, Of face and garb in India never seen, the modern Brahmins have certainly, in the fame manner, received great improvement of features from the conversation of Europeans, whose example, however otherwise vicious, could not fail to convince them of the absurdity of such mental weakness. The horrible custom of burning the wives with the corpse of the deceased husband, is now, says Mr. Dow, in disuse. From whence the late alteration? Not surely from any text of their bidden sacred canon, which they pretend to have enjoyed so many thousand years.

By the light of all these considerations it will appear, that the accounts of the superstition and idolatey of the Brahmins, which, till lately were received, were by no means without foundation. And indeed it were an unparallelled circumstance, were the concurrent testimony of the most authentic writers and intelligent travellers of the 16th and 17th centuries, to deserve no credit. The difference of the religious legends, by these writers asscribed to the Indians, is fairly accounted for by Mr. Dow; by whom also, as just cited, every charge of superstition is virtually confirmed.

Two cardinal points of the philosophy of the Brahmins remain to be mentioned. They hold that dissolutions of the universe, and new creations, at certain periods, shall succeed one another to all eternity. Of the human soul they say, that after various transmigrations and purifications, it shall be absorbed in the Deity and consciousness lost in bliss. By this unintelligible sublimity, we are put in mind of some of the reveries of a Shaftesbury or a Malebranche; but wild imaginations are the growth of every country.

Nor must the religious sect of the Fakier be omitted. These, according to Mr. Dow, are a set of sturdy beggars, who admit any rustian of good parts, to join them; and, under pretence of religious pilgrimages, ramble about in armies of ten or twelve thousand men. The country people sty before them, leaving their goods and their wives, (who esteem it a holiness to be embraced by a...

Nay, a text of the facred Shafter plainly encourages the horrid practice. "The woman who dies with her husband, shall enjoy life eternal with him in heaven." Feeble minds, says Mr. Dow, micinterpreted this into a precept. To those however who are unskilled in casuistry, no admonition can be more obvious.

According to Joannes Oranus, the Brahmins of Agra fay, that the world shall last four ages or worlds, three whereof are past. The first continued one million seven hundred and twenty-eight thousand years. Men in that world lived ten thousand years, were of enormous stature, and of great integrity. Thrice in that period did God visibly appear upon the earth. First in the form of a fish, that he might recuver the book of Brahma (for almost the famt legend, see Dow) which one Causacar had thrown into the sea. The second time in the form of a small, (See Dow) saccount of the symbolical representations of Brahma) that he might make the earth dry and solid. The other time like a hog, to destroy one who called himself God, or as others say, to recover the earth from the sea, which had swallowed it. The second world lasted one million ninety-two thousand and six years, in which period men were as tall as before, but only lived a thousand years. In this, God appeared sour times, once as a monstrous lion, with the lower parts of a woman, to repress the wickedness of a pretender to deity. Secondly, like a poor Brahmin, to punish the impiety of a king who had invented a nethod to sy to heaven. Thirdly, he came in the likeness of one Ram, who see Parcaram. The third continued eight hundred and sour thousand years, in which time God appeared twice. The fourth world shall endure four hundred thousand years, whereof only four thousand six hundred and ninety-two are elapsed. In this period God is to appear once, and some hold that he has already appeared in the person of the emperor Echebar, the same Mahommud Akhar already mentioned. The wifer part of the Brahmins, says Oranus, decry the saburdity of these sables, yet support them before the multitude, less their influence, their wealth and superstition, should vanish together. That these sales are very antient, we have the authority of Straho, who tells us that Calanus told Onescritus of a golden world, where the fountains threamed with milk, honey, wine, and oil, and where th

300

Of tongue unknown, through gulphs undared before, Unknown their aim, have reach'd the Indian shore. To hail their Chief the Indian Lord prepares, And to the fleet he sends his banner'd Nayres: As to the bay the nobles press along, The wondering city pours th'unnumber'd throng. And now brave GAMA and his splendid train, Himself adorn'd in all the pride of Spain, In gilded barges flowly bend to shore, While to the lute the gently-falling oar Now breaks the furges of the briny tide, And now the strokes the cold fresh stream divide. Pleased with the splendour of the Lusian band, On every bank the crowded thousands stand. Begirt with high-plumed nobles, by the flood The first great Minister of India stood, Fakier) to the mercy and lust of these villains. The prayers of a Fakier are highly esteemed, and often implored, in cases of sterility. The wife and the Fakier retire together to prayer, a signal is lest that the Fakier is with the lady, and a sound drubbing is the reward should the husband dare to interrupt their devotions.

their devotions.

We cannot finish this note, long as it is, without observing the vast similarity which obtains among all barbarous nations. When the Portuguese admiral, Pedro de Cabral, discovered the Brazils, he sound a sect of religionists called Pages, who were venerated in the same manner as the Fakiers of India. "Hi quocunque veniunt, says Oforius, summo omnium plausu recipiuntur, &c. Wherever these come, they are received with the loudest sacelamations, the ways are crowded, verses stang to the music of the country, and dances are performed before them. The most beautiful women, whether virgins or wives, are fubmitted to their embraces. Opiniuntur enim miseri, si illos placatos babuerint, omnia sibi feliciter eventura; for these wretched ignorants believe, that if they can please these men, every thing will happen well to them."

To conclude: The writers who have treated of the mission of Xavier, relate, that there is extant in India the writings of a Malabar poet, who wrote nine hundred epigrams, each consisting of eight verses, in ridicule of the worship of the Brahmins, whom he treats with great asperity and contempt. Would any of our diligent enquirers after oriental learning favour the Public with an authentic account of the works of this poet of Malabar, he would undoubtedly confer a singular savour on the republic of letters.

The Catual his name in India's tongue: To GAMA swift the lordly Regent sprung; His open arms the valiant Chief enfold, And now he lands him on the shore of gold: With pomp unwonted India's nobles greet The fearless heroes of the warlike fleet. A couch on shoulders borne, in India's mode, With gold the canopy and purple glow'd, Receives the Lusian captain; equal rides The lordly Catual, and onward guides, While GAMA's train, and thousands of the throng Of India's fons, encircling pour along. To hold discourse in various tongues they try; In vain; the accents unremembered die Instant as utter'd. Thus on Babel's plain Each builder heard his mate, and heard in vain. GAMA the while, and India's fecond Lord, Hold glad dialogues, as the various word The faithful Moor unfolds. The city gate They past, and onward, towered in sumptuous state, Before them now the facred temple rose; The portals wide the sculptured shrines disclose. The Chiefs advance, and, entered now, behold The gods of wood, cold stone, and shining gold; Various of figure, and of various face, As the foul Demon will'd the likeness base.

Taught

Taught to behold the rays of godhead shine Fair imaged in the human face divine, With facred horror thrill'd, the Lufians viewed The monster forms, Chimera-like, and brude. Here spreading horns an human visage bore; So frown'd stern Jove in Lybia's fane of yore. One body here two various faces rear'd; So ancient Janus o'er his Ihrine appear'd. An hundred arms another brandish'd wide: So Titan's fon the race of heaven ' defy'd. And here a dog his fnarling tufks difplay'd; Anubis thus in Memphis' hallowed shade Grinn'd horrible. With vile prostrations low Before these shrines the blinded Indians bow. And now again the splendid pomp proceeds; To India's Lord the haughty Regent leads.

b The monster forms, Chimera-like, and rude. . Chimera, a monster slain by Bellero-

First, dire Chimera's conquest was enjoyn'd, A mingled monster of no mortal kind; Behind a dragon's fiery tail was spread, A goat's rough body bore a lion's head; Her pitchy nostrils flaky flames expire, Her gaping throat emits infernal fire.

Pope's Il. vi.

which the Catual led him, was a Christian church. At their entrance they were met by four priests, who seemed to make crosses on their foreheads. The walls were painted with many images. In the middle was a hittle round chapel, in the well of which opposite to the entrance, stood an image which could hardly be discovered; Erat enim locus ita ab omni folis radio seclusus, ut vix aliquis malignæ lucis splonder in eum penetraret. The four priests ascending, some entered the chapel by a little brass door, and pointing to the benighted image, cried aloud. Mary to the benighted image, cried aloud, Marx, Mary. The Catual and his attendants proftrated themselves on the ground, while the Lusians on their bended knees adored the blessed virgin. Virginemque Dei matrem more nostris ufitute vienerantur." Thus Osorius. Another writer Yays, that a Portuguese having fome doubt exclaimed, If this be the Devil's image, I however worthip God.

Before these sprines the blinded Indians how. In this instance, Camoons has with great art deviated from the truth of history. As it was the great purpose of his hero to epropagate the law of heaven in the East, it would have been highly abfurd to have represented Gama and his attendants as on their knees in a Pagan temple. This, however, was the case. "Gama, who had been told, fays Oforius, that there were many Christians in India, conjectured that the temple, to

To view the glorious Leader of the fleet Increasing thousands swell o'er every street; High o'er the roofs the struggling youths ascend, The hoary fathers o'er the portals bend, The windows sparkle with the female blaze Of eyes, of rubies, and the diamond's rays. And now the train with folemn state and slow. Approach the royal gate, through many a row Of fragrant wood walks, and of balmy bowers, Radiant with fruitage, ever gay with flowers. Spacious the dome its pillar'd grandeur spread. Nor to the burning day high tower'd the head; The citron groves around the windows glow'd, And branching palms their grateful shade bestow'd; The mellow light a pleasing radiance cast; The marble walls Dædalian sculpture graced. Here India's fate, from darkest times of 'old, The wondrous artist on the stone inroll'd;

e Here India's fate—The description of the palace of the Zamorim, situated among aromatic groves, is according to history; the embellishment of the walls is in imitation of Virgil's description of the palace of king Latinus:

Testum.augustum, ingens, centum sublime columnis, Urbe fuit summa, &c.

The palace, built by Picus, vast and proud,
Supported by a hundred pillars stood
And round encompass'd with a rising wood.
The pile o'erlook'e the tawn, and drew the fight,
Surprised at once with reverence and delight.

Above the portal, carved in cedar wood,
Wasted in their sanks their godlike grandsites stood.

Old Saturn, with his crooked feythe on high;
And Italus, that led the colony;
And ancient Janus with his double face,
And hunch of keys, the porter of the place.
There flood Sabinus, planter of the vines,
On a fhert pruning hook his head reclinee;
And fludioully furveys his generous-wines.
Then warlike kings who for their country fought,
And hooourable wounds from battle brought.
Around the pofts hung helmets, darts, and spears;
And eaptive chariots, axes, fhields, and bars;
And broken beaks of shipa, the trophies of their

Above the rest, as chief of all the band
Was Picus placed, a buckler in his hand;
His other waved a long divining wand.
Girt in his Gabin gown the heru sate
Dayo, Bu. vis.

Here o'er the meadows, by Hydaspes' stream, In fair array the marshall'd legions seem: A youth of gleeful eye the squadrons led, Smooth was his cheek, and glow'd with purest red; Around his spear the curling vine-leaves waved; And by a streamlet of the river laved, Behind her founder Nysa's walls were rear'd *; So breathing life the ruddy god appear'd, Had Semele beheld the smiling boy, The mother's heart had proudly heav'd with joy. Unnumber'd here were seen th'Assyrian throng, That drank whole rivers as they march'd along: Each eye seem'd earnest on their warrior queen, High was her port, and furious was her mien; Her valour only equall'd by her lust; Fast by her side her courser paw'd the dust, Her fon's * vile rival; reeking to the plain Fell the hot fweat-drops as he champt the rein. And here display'd, most glorious to behold, The Grecian banners opening many a fold

e Eebind ber sounder Nysa's avalls avere

-at distance far The Ganges laved the avide-extended avar-This is in the perspective manner of the beautiful descriptions of the figures on the shield of Achilles. IL. XVIII.

f Had Semele beheld the smiling boy

The Theban Bacchus, to whom the Greek fabulists ascribed the Indian expedition of Sesostris or Osiris king of Egypt.

8 Her son's vile rival - The infamous passion of Semiramis for a horse, has all the pation of Semiramis for a norte, has all the air of a fable invented by the Greeks to fignify the extreme libidiny of that queen. Her inceftuous passion for her son Nynias, however, is confirmed by the testimony of the best authors. Shocked at such an horrid amourth. Nynias ordered her to be put to death. CasSeem'd trembling on the gale; at distance far The Ganges laved the wide-extended war. Here the blue marble gives the helmets' gleam. Here from the cuiras shoots the golden beam. A proud-ey'd youth, with palms unnumber'd gay. Of the bold veterans led the brown array; Scornful of mortal birth enshrin'd he rode, Call'd Jove his father h, and assumed the god.

While dauntless GAMA and his train survey'd The sculptured walls, the lofty Regent said; For nobler wars than these you wondering see That ample space th' eternal fates decree: Sacred to these th' unpictured wall remains, Unconscious yet of vanquish'd India's chains. Assured we know the awful day shall come, Big with tremendous fate, and India's doom. The fons of Brahma, by the god their fire Taught to illume the dread divining fire, From the drear mansions of the dark abodes Awake the dead, or call th'infernal gods; Then round the flame, while glimmering ghastly blue, Behold the future scene arise to view. The fons of Brahma in the magic hour Beheld the foreign foe tremendous lour;

h Call'd Jove bis father.— The bon mot of Olympias on this pretention of her fon Alexander, was admired by the ancients.

[&]quot;This hot-headed youth, forfooth, cannot be at rest unless he embroil me in a quarrel

[&]quot;with Juno." QUINT. CURT. Unknown

Unknown their tongue, their face, and strange attire, And their bold eye-balls burn'd with warlike ire:
They saw the chief o'er prostrate India rear
The glittering terrors of his awful spear.
But swift behind these wintery days of woe
A spring of joy arose in liveliest glow,
Such gentle manners leagued with wisdom reign'd.
In the dread victors, and their rage restrain'd.
Beneath their sway majestic, wise, and mild,
Proud of her victors' laws thrice happier India smiled.
So to the prophets of the Magi train
The visions rose, that never rose in vain.

The Regent ceased; and now with solemn pace
The Chiefs approach the regal hall of grace.
The tapstried walls with gold were pictured of ore,
And slowery velvet spread the marble sloor.
In all the grandeur of the Indian state
High on a blazing couch the Monarch sate,
With starry gems the purple curtains shined,
And ruby slowers and golden soliage twined
Around the silver pillars: High ofer head
The golden canopy its radiance shed:
Of cloth of gold the sovereign's mantle shone,
And his high turban slamed with precious stone.

The tapstried walls with gold were pictured o'er,

And slowery welvet spread the marble sloor. ——According to Osorius.

Sublime and awful was his sapient mien,
Lordly his posture, and his brow serene.
An hoary sire submiss on bended knee,
(Low bow'd his head,) in India's luxury,
A leaf', all fragrance to the glowing taste,
Before the king each little while replaced.
The patriarch Brahmin, soft and slow he rose,
Advancing now to lordly GAMA bows,
And leads him to the throne; in silent state
The Monarch's nod assigns the Captain's seat;
The Lusian train in humbler distance stand:
Silent the Monarch eyes the foreign band
With awful mien; when valiant GAMA broke
The solemn pause, and thus majestic spoke;

From where the crimson sun of evening laves
His blazing chariot in the western waves,
I come, the herald of a mighty King,
And holy vows of lasting friendship bring
To thee, O Monarch, for resounding Fame
Far to the west has borne thy princely name,
All India's sovereign thou! Nor deem I sue,
Great as thou art, the humble suppliant's due.
Whate'er from western Tagus to the Nile,
Inspires the monarch's wish, the merchants' toil,

1 A leaf.—The Betel.

From where the north-star gleams o'er seas of frost, To Ethiopia's utmost burning coast, Whate'er the sea, whate'er the land bestows, In my great Monarch's realm unbounded flows. Pleased thy high grandeur and renown to hear, My Sovereign offers friendship's bands sincere: Mutual he asks them, naked of disguise, Then every bounty of the smiling skies Shower'd on his shore and thine, in mutual flow, Shall joyful Commerce on each shore bestow. Our might in war, what vanquish'd nations fell, Beneath our spear, let trembling Afric tell; Survey my floating towers, and let thine ear, Dread as it roars, our battle thunder hear. If friendship then thy honest wish explore, That dreadful thunder on thy foes shall roar. Our banners o'er the crimson field shall sweep, And our tall navies ride the foamy deep, Till not a foe against thy land shall rear Th' invading bowsprit, or the hostile spear; My King, thy brother, thus thy wars shall join, The glory his, the gainful harvest thine.

Brave GAMA spake: the Pagan King replies, From lands which now behold the morning rise,

While

While eve's dim clouds the Indian sky enfold, Glorious to us an offer'd league we hold. Yet shall our will in silence rest unknown, Till what your laud, and who the King you own, Our Council deeply weigh. Let joy the while, And the glad feast the fleeting hours beguile. Ah! to the wearied mariner, long tost O'er briny waves, how fweet the long-fought coast! The night now darkens; on the friendly shore Let foft repose your wearied strength restore, Assured an answer from our lips to bear, Which, not displeased, your Sovereign Lord shall hear. More 1 now we add not—From the hall of state Withdrawn, they now approach the Regent's gate; The fumptuous banquet glows; all India's pride Heap'd on the board the royal feast supplied. Now o'er the dew-drops of the eastern lawn Gleamed the pale radiance of the star of dawn, The valiant GAMA on his couch reposed, And balmy rest each Lusian eye-lid closed; When the high Catual, watchful to fulfill The cautious mandates of his Sovereign's will, In fecret converse with the Moor retires, And, earnest, much of Lusus' sons enquires;

What

¹ More now we add not—The tenor of and Gama, is according to the truth of this first conversation between the Zamorim history.

What laws, what holy rites, what monarch fway'd The warlike race? When thus the just Mozaide;

The land from whence these warriors well I know, (To neighbouring earth my hapless birth I owe) Illustrious Spain, along whose western shores Grey-dappled eve the dying twilight pours.— A wondrous prophet gave their holy lore, The godlike Seer a virgin-mother bore, Th' Eternal Spirit on the human race, So be they taught, bestow'd such awful grace. In war unmatch'd they rear the trophied crest: What " terrors oft have thrill'd my infant breast, When their brave deeds my wondering fathers told; How from the lawns, where, chrystalline and cold, The Guadiana rowls his murmuring tide, And those where purple by the Tago's side, The lengthening vineyards glisten o'er the sield, Their warlike fires my routed fires expell'd: Nor paused their rage; the furious seas they braved, Nor loftiest walls, nor castled mountains saved; Round Afric's thousand bays their navies rode, And their proud armies o'er our armies trod.

m What terrors oft have thrill'd my infant breast—The enthusiasm with which Monzaida, a Moor, talks of the Portuguese, may perhaps to some appear unnatural. Camoens seems to be aware of this by giving a reason for that enthusiasm in the first speech of Mozaida to Gama;

Heaven fent you here for some great work divine, And heaven inspires my breast your sacred toils to join. And that this Moor did conceive a great affection to Gama, whose religion he embraced, and to whom he proved of the utmost service, is according to the truth of history. Nor less, let Spain through all her kingdoms own, O'er other foes their dauntless valour shone: Let Gaul confess, her mountain ramparts wild, Nature in vain the hoar Pyrenians piled. No foreign lance could e'er their rage restrain, Unconquer'd still the warrior race remain. More would you hear, secure your care may trust The answer of their lips, so nobly just, Conscious of inward worth, of manners plain, Their manly fouls the gilded lye disdain. Then let thine eyes their lordly might admire, And mark the thunder of their arms of fire: The shore with trembling hears the dreadful found, And rampired walls lie fmoaking on the ground. Speed to the fleet; their arts, their prudence weigh, How wife in peace, in war how dread, furvey.

With keen defire the craftful Pagan burn'd;
Soon as the morn in orient blaze return'd,
To view the fleet his splendid train prepares;
And now attended by the lordly Nayres,
The shore they cover, now the oarsmen sweep
The foamy surface of the azure deep:
And now brave Paulus gives the friendly hand,
And high on Gama's lofty deck they stand.

Bright to the day the purple fail-cloaths glow, Wide to the gale the filken enfigns flow; The pictured flags display the warlike strife; Bold feem the heroes as inspired by life. Here arm to arm the fingle combat strains, Here burns the combat on the tented plains General and fierce; the meeting lances thrust, And the black blood feems fmoaking on the dust. With earnest eyes the wondering Regent views The pictured warriors, and their history fues. But now the ruddy juice, by Noah a found, In foaming goblets circled fwiftly round, And o'er the deck fwift rose the festive board; Yet, smiling oft, refrains the Indian Lord: His faith forbade with other tribe to join The facred meal, esteem'd a rite odivine.

Gen. ix. 20. And Neah began to be an husbandman, and he planted a vineyard, and he

A thousand rites, and washings o'er and o'er Can scarce bis tainted purity restore.

Nothing, fays Osorius, but the death of the unhappy commoner can wipe off the pol-lution. Yet we are told by the same author, that Indian nobility cannot be forfeited, or even tarnished by the basest and greatest of crimes; nor can one of mean birth become great or noble by the most illustrious actions. The noblemen, says the same writer, adopt the children of their fifters, esteeming there can be no other certainty of the relationship of their heirs. But what above all may be called the characteristic of the Indian, is his total infensibility to the passion of Love;

Lost to the heart-ties, to bis neighbour's arms The willing bufband yields his spouse's charms.

drank of the wine, &c.

• His faith forbade with other tribe to join The facred meal, esteem'd a rite diwine.

The opinion of the sacredness of the table is very ancient in the East. It is plainly to be discovered in the history of Abraham. When Melchizedek, a king and priest, blessed Abraham, it is said, And he bought forth bread and wine and be blessed him. Gen. xiv. 18. The Patriarchs only drank wine, fays Dr. Stukely, on their more folemn festivals, when they were faid to rejoice before the Lord. Other customs of the Indians are mentioned by Camoens in this book. If a noble should touch a person of another another tribe,

In bold vibrations, thrilling on the ear,
The battle founds the Lusian trumpets rear;
Loud burst the thunders of the arms of fire,
Slow round the sails the clouds of smoke aspire,
And rolling their dark volumes o'er the day
The Lusian war, in dreadful pomp, display.
In deepest thought the careful Regent weigh'd
The pomp and power at GAMA's nod bewray'd,
Yet seem'd alone in wonder to behold
The glorious heroes and the wars half told

To some perhaps the feebleness of the constitutions of the Gentoos may account for this apothy; and to several circumstances may their feebleness be attributed. The men marry before fourteen and the women at about ten or eleven. Rice, their principal food, affords but little nourishment, and they are extremely averse to any manly exercise. It is better to sit than to walk, they say, to lie down than to fit, to sleep than to wake, and death is better than all. The unparallelled pufillanimity with which they have long submitted to the oppressions of a few Arabs, their Mohammedan masters, likewife, shews their deadness to every manly resentment. Yet, notwithstanding all this, though incapable of the passion of love, they prove the position, (for which physicians can easily account) that debility and letchery go hand in hand. Montesquieu, in enumerating his reasons why Christianity will never prevail in the East, advances, as one, the prohibition of polygamy, which he mentions as the appointment of nature, and necessary in these climates. Tristram Shandy tells us, that his father was a most excellent fystem-builder, was sure to make his Theory look well, though no man ever crucified the truth at such an unmerciful rate. With all due descrence to the great genius of Montesquieu, his blunder here is rather ludicrous. In every country the births of males and females are nearly proportioned to each other. "Polygamy, fays Mr. Dow, is permitted in Hindostan, but feldom practifed; for they very rationally think, that one wife is sufficient for one man." If in any country polygamy is the appointment of nature, the more athletic nations of Europe have the best claim. But the warlike independent spirit of the northern tribes, who viewed their princes as their companions in war, would never allow their leaders to appropriate eight hundred or a thousand of the finest women, each for his own particular luxury. Their natural ideas of liberty forbade it; while on the other hand the flavish Asiatics, who viewed their masters as beings of a superior rank, submitted to the lust of these masters, whose debility prompted the defire of unbounded variety. This history of polygamy will be found to be just. It is not the child of nature, it is the offspring of tyranny, and is only to be found where the most absolute tyranny subsists. Neither to the genial vigour of passion, but to raging, irritated debility, both the philosopher and physician will attribute the unblushing prevalence of some crimes, crimes which disgrace human nature, and which particularly characterise the depraved manners of the enfeebled East.

In filent poefy——Swift from the board High crown'd with wine, uprose the Indian Lord; Both the bold GAMAS, and their generous Peer, The brave Coello, rose, prepared to hear With meet attendance, or the meet reply: Fixt and enquiring was the Regent's eye: The warlike image of an hoary fire, Whose name shall live till earth and time expire, His wonder fixt; and more than human glow'd 'The hero's look; his robes of Grecian mode; A bough, his enfign, in his right he waved, A leafy bough—But I, fond man depraved! Where would I speed, as mad'ning in a dream, Without your aid, ye Nymphs of Tago's stream! Or yours, ye Dryads of Mondego's bowers! Without your aid how vain my wearied powers! Long yet and various lies my arduous way Through louring tempests and a boundless sea. Oh then, propitious hear your fon implore, And guide my vessel to the happy shore. Ah! fee how long what per'lous days, what woes On many a foreign coast around me rose, As dragg'd by Fortune's chariot wheels along I footh'd my forrows with the warlike of fong;

the ocean, while in Africa, and in India. See his Life.

[•] _____ the avarlite fong ——Though Camoens began his Lustad in Portugal, almost the whole of it was written while on

Wide ocean's horrors lengthening now around, And now my footsteps trod the hostile ground; Yet midst each danger of tumultuous war Your Lusian heroes ever claim'd my care: As Canace of old, ere P felf-destroy'd, One hand the pen, and one the sword employ'd. Degraded now, by poverty abhorr'd, The guest dependent at the Lordling's board ; Now bleft with all the wealth fond hope could crave, Soon I beheld that wealth beneath the q wave For ever lost; myself escaped alone, On the wild shore all friendless, hopeless, thrown; My life, like Judah's heaven-doom'd king of 'yore, By miracle prolong'd; yet not the more To end my forrows: woes fucceeding woes Belied my earnest hopes of sweet repose: In place of bays around my brows to flied Their facred honours, o'er my destined head Foul Calumny proclaim'd the fraudful tale, And left me mourning in a dreary ' jail.

Degraded now, by powerty abborr'd-

Alludes to his fortunes in India. The latter circumstance relates particularly to the base and inhuman treatment he received on his return to Goa, after his unhappy shipwreek. See his Life.

P As Canace—Daughter of Eolus. Her father having thrown her incestuous child to the dogs, sent her a sword, with which she slew herself. In Ovid she writes an epistle to her husband-brother, where she thus describes herself;

Dextra tenet calamum, strictum tenet altera ferrum.

⁹ Soon I beheld that wealth beneath the

For ever lost - See the Life of Camoens.

My life, like Judah's heaven-doom'd king of yore—Hezekiah. See Isaiah xxxviii.

And left me mourning in a dreary jail—
This, and the whole paragraph from

Such was the meed, alas! on me bestow'd,
Bestow'd by those for whom my numbers glow'd,
By those who to my toils their laurel honours owed.

Ye gentle Nymphs of Tago's rofy bowers. Ah, fee what letter'd Patron-Lords are yours! Dull as the herds that graze their flowery dales, To them in vain the injured Muse bewails: No fostering care their barb'rous hands bestow, Though to the Muse their fairest same they owe. Ah, cold may prove the future Priest of Fame Taught by my fate: yet will I not disclaim Your smiles, ye Muses of Mondego's shade, Be still my dearest joy your happy aid! And hear my vow; Nor king, nor loftiest peer Shall e'er from Me the song of flattery hear; Nor crafty tyrant, who in office reigns, Smiles on his king, and binds the land in chains; His king's worst foe: Nor he whose raging ire, And raging wants, to shape his course, conspire; True to the clamours of the blinded crowd, Their changeful Proteus, infolent and loud: Nor he whose honest mien secures applause, Grave though he feem, and father of the laws, Who, but half-patriot, niggardly denies Each other's merit, and witholds the prize:

Who 'fpurns the Muse, nor feels the raptured strain, Useless by him esteem'd, and idly vain:
For him, for these, no wreath my hand shall twine;
On other brows th' immortal rays shall shine:

P Who spurns the Muse—Similarity of condition has produced similarity of sentiment in Camoens and Spenser. Each was the ornament of his country and of his age, and each was cruelly neglected by the Men of Power, who, in truth, were incapable to judge of their merit, or to relish their writings. We have seen several of the strictures of Camoens on the barbarous Nobility of Portugal. The similar complaints of Spenser will shew that neglect of Genius, however, was not confined to the court of Lisbon.

O Grief of griefs! O Gall of all good hearts! To see that Virtue should despised be Of such as first were raised for Virtue's parts, And now broad spreading like an aged tree, Let none shoot up that nigh them planted be. O let not those of whom the Muse is scorned, Alive or dead be by the Muse adorned.

Ruins of Time.

It is thought Lord Burleigh, who withheld the bounty intended by Queen Elifabeth, is here meant. But he is more clearly stigmatized in these remarkable lines, where the misery of dependence on Courtfavour is painted in colours which must recal several strokes of the Lusiad to the mind of the Reader.

Full little knowest thou that hast not tried,
What hell it is, in suing long to bide;
To lose good days, that might be better spent,
To waste long nights in pensive discontent;
To speed to-day, to be put back to-morrow,
To feed on hope, to pine with fear and sorrow;
To have thy Princess' grace, yet want her peers;
To have thy asking, yet wait many years;
To fret thy soul with crosses and with cares,
To eat thy heart thro' comfortless despairs;
To fawn, to crowch, to wait, to ride, to run,
To spend, to give, to want, to be undone.

Mother Hubberd's Tale.

These lines exasperated still more the inelegant, the illiberal Burleigh. So true is the observation of Mr. Hughes, that, "even the sighs of a miserable man are sometimes resented as an affront by him that is the ocsion of them."

The arrival of Gama in India-In several parts of the Lufiad the Portuguese Poet has given ample proof that he could catch the genulne spirit of Homer and Virgil. The Seventh Lusiad throughout bears a striking resemblance to the seventh and eighth Eneid. Much of the action is naturally the same; Æneas lands it Italy, and Gama in India; but the conduct of Camoens, in his masterly imitation of his great master, particularly demands observation. Had Statius or Ovid described the landing or reception of Æneas, we should undoubtedly have been presented with pictures different from those of the pencil of Virgil. We should have feen much buille and fire, and perhaps much smoke and false dignity. Yet if we may judge from the Odyssey, Homer, had he written the Æneid, would have written as the Roman Poet wrote, would have prefented us with a calm majestic narrative, till every circumstance was explained, and then would have given the concluding books of hurry and fire. In this manner has Vir-gil written, and in this manner has Camoens followed him, as far as the different nature of his fubject would allow. In Virgil, king Latinus is informed by prodigies and prophecy of the fate of his kingdom, and of the newlanded strangers. Æneas enters Latium. The dinner on the grass, and the prophecy of famine turned into a jest. He sends ambasfadors to Latinus, whose palace is described. The embaffy is received in a friendly manner. Juno, enraged, calls the affiflance of the Fiends, and the truce is broken. Æneas, admonished in a dream, seeks the aid of Evander. The voyage up the Tyber, the court of Evander, and the facrifices in which he was employed are particularly described. In all this there is no blaze of fire, no earnest hurry. These are judiciously reserved for their after and proper place. In the fame manner Camoens lands his hero in India, and though in some circumstances the resemblance to Virgil is evident, yet he has followed him as a free imitator, who was conscious of his own strength, and not as a Copyist. He has not deserved that shrewd satire which Mr. Pope, not unjustly, throws on Virgil himself. "Had the galley of Sergestus been broken, says he, if the chariot of Eumelus had not been demolished? Or Mnessheus been cast from the helm, had not the other been thrown from his seat?"

He who the path of honour ever trod, True to his King, his Country, and his God, On his blest head my hands shall fix the crown Wove of the deathless laurels of Renown.

In a word, that calm dignity of poetical narrative which breathes through the seventh and eighth Æneid, is judiciously copied, as most proper for the subject; and with the hand of a master characteristically sustained throughout the seventh book of the Poem which celebrates the discovery of the Eastern World.

END OF THE SEVENTH BOOK.

L U S I A D.

B O O K VIII.

ITH eye unmoved the filent CATUAL view'd The pictured fire with feeming life endued;
A verdant vine-bough waving in his right,
Smooth flowed his fweepy beard of gloffy white,
When thus, as fwift the Moor unfolds the word,
The valiant Paulus to the Indian Lord;

Bold though these figures frown, yet bolder far These godlike heroes shined in ancient war. In that hoar fire, of mien serene, august, Lusus behold, no robber-chief unjust; His cluster'd bough, the same which Bacchus bore , He waves, the emblem of his care of yore; The friend of savage man, to Bacchus dear, The son of Bacchus, or the bold compeer, What time his yellow locks with vine-leaves curl'd, The youthful god subdued the savage world, Bade vineyards glisten o'er the dreary waste, And humanized the nations as he past. Lusus, the loved companion of the god, In Spain's sair bosom sixt his last abode, Our kingdom sounded, and illustrious reign'd In those sair lawns, the blest Elysium beingn'd, a His cluster'd bough, the same which Bacchus bore.—Camoens immediately before, and in the former book, calls the ensign of Lusus a bough; here he calls it the green thyrsus of Bacchus,

O verde Tyrso soi de Bacco usado.

The thyrsus however was a javelin twisted with ivy-leaves, used in the facrifices of Bacchus.

In those fair lawns the blest Elysium feign'd-In this affertion our author has the authority of Strabo, a foundation suffi-cient for a poet. Nor are there wanting several Spanish writers, particularly Barbefa, who feriously affirm that Homer drew the fine description of Elysium, in his fourth Odyssey, from the beautiful valleys of Spain, where in one of his voyages, they fay, he arrived. Egypt, however, feems to have a better title to this honour. The fable of Charon, and the judges of the poetical hell, are evidently borrowed from the Egyptian rites of burial, and are older than Homer. After a ferryman had conveyed the corpfe over a lake, certain judges examined the life of the deceased, particularly his claim to the virtue of loyalty, and, according to the report, decreed or refused the honours of se-pulture. The place of the Catacombs, according to Diodorus Siculus, was surrounded with deep canals, beautiful meadows, and a wilderness of groves. And it is universally known the greatest part of the Grecian fables were fabricated from the customs and opinions of Egypt. Several other nations have also claimed the honour of affording the idea of the fields of the Blessed. Even the Scotch challenge it. Many Grecian fables, fays an author of that country, are evidently founded on the reports of the Phœ-nician failors. That these navigators traded to the coasts of Britain is certain. In the middle of fummer, the season when the ancients performed their voyages, for about fix weeks there is no night over the Orkney islands; the disk of the fun during that time fearcely finking below the horizon. This appearance, together with the calm which usually prevails at that season, and the beautiful verdure of the islands, could not fail to excite the admiration of the Tyrians; and their accounts of the place naturally afforded the idea that these islands were inhabited by the spirits of the Just. This, fays our author, is countenanced by Homer, who places his islands of the Happy at the extremity of the ocean. That the fables of Scylla, the Gorgades, and feveral others, were founded on the accounts of navigators, scems probable; and on this suppofition the Infulæ Fottunatæ, and PurpuraWhere winding oft the Guadiana roves,

And Douro murmurs through the flowery groves.
Here with his bones he left his deathless fame,
And Lusitania's clime shall ever bear his name.
That other chief th'embroider'd silk displays,
Tost o'er the deep whole years of weary days
On Tago's banks at last his vows he paid:
To Wisdom's godlike power, the Jove-born Maid,
Who fired his lips with eloquence divine,
On Tago's banks he reared the hallowed shrine.
Ulysses he, though fated to destroy
On Asian ground the heaven-built towers of 'Troy,
On Europe's strand, more grateful to the skies,
He bade th' eternal walls of Lisbon 'rise.

But who that godlike terror of the plain, Who strews the smoaking field with heaps of slain?

niæ, now the Canary and Madeira islands, also claim the honour of giving colours to the description of Elysium. The truth however appears to be this; That a place of happiness is reserved for the spirits of the Good is the natural suggestion of that anxiety and hope concerning the suture, which animates the human breast. All the barbarous nations of Africa and America agree in placing their heaven in beautiful islands at an immense distance over the ocean. The idea is universal, and is natural to every nation in the state of barbarous simplicity.

Alluding to the fable of Neptune, Apollo, and Laomedon.

d On Europe's strand, more grateful to the skies,

He base th' eternal walls of Liston rise.—
For some account of this tradition see the note p. 107. Antient traditions, however fabulous, have a good effect in poetry. Virgil has not scrupled to insert one, which required an apology.

Prisca sides salto, sed sama perennis.

Spenser has given us the history of Brute and his descendants at sull length in the Faerie Queene; and Milton, it is known, was so fond of that absurd legend, that he intended to write a poem on the subject; and by this fondness was induced to mention it as a truth in his introduction to the history of England.

What

What numerous legions fly in dire difmay, Whose standards wide the eagle's wings display? The Pagan asks; the brother 'Chief replies, Unconquer'd deem'd, proud Rome's dread standard slies. His crook thrown by, fired by his nation's woes, The hero shepherd Viriatus rose; His country faved proclaim'd his warlike fame, And Rome's wide empire trembled at his name. That generous pride which Rome to Pyrrhus bore', To him they shew'd not; for they fear'd him more. Not on the field o'ercome by manly force, Peaceful he flept, and now a murdered corfe By treason sain he lay. How stern, behold, That other hero, firm, erect, and bold: The power by which he boasted he devined, Beside him pictur'd stands, the milk-white hind: Injured by Rome, the stern Sertorius fled To Tago's shore, and Lusus' offspring led; Their worth he knew; in scatter'd flight he drove The standards painted with the birds of Jove. And lo, the flag whose shining colours own The glorious Founder of the Lusian throne!

famous affaffination of Viriatus, that the Roman fenate did him great honour; ut videretur aliter virci non petuisse; it was a confession that they could not otherwise conquer him. Vid. Flor. 1. 17. For a suller account of this great man, see the note on p. 13.

the brother Chief—Paulus de Gama.

That generous pride which Rome to Pyrrbus bore.—When Pyrrhus king of Epirus was at war with the Romans, his physician offered to poison him. The senate rejected the proposal, and acquainted Pyrrhus of the designed treason. Florus remarks on the in-

Some deem the warrior of Hungarian 'race,
Some from Loraine the godlike hero trace.
From Tagus' banks the haughty Moor expell'd,
Galicia's fons, and Leon's warriors quell'd,
To weeping Salem's ever-hallowed meads,
His warlike bands the holy Henry leads,
By holy war to fanctify his crown,
And to his latest race auspicious wast it down.

And who this awful Chief? aloud exclaims
The wondering Regent, o'er the field he flames
In dazzling steel, wheree'r he bends his course
The battle sinks beneath his headlong force;
Against his troops, though few, the numerous foes
In vain their spears and towery walls oppose.
With simoaking blood his armour sprinkled o'er,
High to the knees his courser paws in gore;
O'er crowns and blood-stain'd ensigns scatter'd round
He rides; his courser's brazen hoofs resound.
In that great chief, the second GAMA cries,
The first halonzo strikes thy wondering eyes.
From Lusus' realm the Pagan Moors he drove;
Heaven, whom he loved, bestow'd on him such love,

See the note on p. 95.

h The first Alonzo—King of Portugal. See p. 96, &c.

Beneath him, bleeding of its mortal wound, The Moorish strength lay prostrate on the ground. Nor Ammon's fon, nor greater Julius dared With troops so few, with hosts so numerous warr'd: Fame faw his godlike deeds, and folemn swore, To boast unmatch'd the Roman name no more. Nor less shall Fame the subject heroes own: Behold that hoary warrior's rageful frown! On his young pupil's flight his burning 1 eyes He darts, and, Turn thy flying host, he cries, Back to the field — The Veteran and the Boy Back to the field exult with furious joy: Their ranks mow'd down, the boastful foe recedes, The vanquish'd triumph, and the victor bleeds. Again, that mirror of unshaken faith, Egaz behold, a chief felf-doom'd to k death. Beneath Castilia's sword his monarch lay; Homage he vow'd his helpless king should pay; His haughty king relieved, the treaty spurns, With conscious pride the noble Egaz burns;

¹ On his young pupil's flight.—" Some, indeed, most writers say, that the 'queen (of whom see p. 96.) advancing with her army towards Guimaraez, the king, without waiting till his governor joined him, engaged them and was routed: but that afterwards the remains of his army being joined by the troops under the command of Egaz Munitz, engaged the army of the queen a second time, and gained a complete victory." Univ. Hist.

Egaz behold, a chief felf-doom'd to death.

See the same story, p. 99. Though history afforos no authentic document of this transaction, tradition, the Poet's authority, is not silent. And the monument of Egaz in the monastery of Paço de Souza gives it countenance. Egaz and his family are there represented, in bas relief, in the attitude and garb, says Castera, as described by Camoons.

His comely spouse and infant race he leads,
Himself the same, in sentenced selons' weeds,
Around their necks the knotted halters bound,
With naked seet they tread the slinty ground;
And prostrate now before Castilia's throne
Their offer'd lives their monarch's pride atone.
Ah! Rome no more thy generous consul boast,
Whose lorn submission saved his ruin'd host:
No father's woes assail'd his stedsast mind;
The dearest ties the Lusian chief resign'd.

There, by the stream, a Town besieged behold, The Moorish tents the shatter'd walls infold. Fierce as the lion from the covert springs, When hunger gives his rage the whirlwind's wings; From ambush, lo, the valiant Fuaz pours, And whelms in sudden rout th' astonish'd Moors. The Moorish king in captive chains he fends; And low at Lisbon's throne the royal captive bends. Fuaz again the artist's skill displays; Far o'er the ocean shine his ensign's rays:

Ab Rome! no more thy generous conful boast—Sc. Posthumus, who, overpowered by the Samnites, submitted to the indignity of passing under the yoke or gallows.

"The Meorish king—The Alcaydes, or tributary Governors under the Miramolin tributary Governors under the Miramolin or Emperor of Morocco, are often by the Spanish and Portuguese writers stiled kings. He who was surprized and taken prisoner by Don Fuaz Roupinho was named Gama. Fuaz, after having gained the first naval victory of the Portuguese, also experienced their first deseat. With one and twenty sail he attacked fifty-four large gallies of the Moors. The sea, says Brandan, which had lately surnished him with trophies, now supplied him with a tomb.

In crackling flames the Moorish galleys fly. And the red blaze ascends the blushing sky: O'er Avila's high steep the flames aspire, And wrap the forests in a sheet of fire: There feem the waves beneath the prows to boil: And distant far around for many a mile The glassy deep reflects the ruddy blaze; Far on the edge the yellow light decays, And blends with hovering blackness. Great and dread Thus shone the day when first the combat bled, The first our heroes battled on the main, The glorious prelude of our naval reign, Which now the waves beyond the burning zone, And northern Greenland's frost-bound billows own. Again behold brave Fuaz dares the fight! O'erpower'd he finks beneath the Moorish might; Smiling in death the martyr-hero lies, And lo, his foul triumphant mounts the skies. Here now behold, in warlike pomp pourtray'd, A foreign navy brings the pious " aid. Lo, marching from the decks the squadrons spread, Strange their attire, their aspect firm and dread. The holy Cross their ensigns bold display, To Salem's aid they plough'd the watery way;

A foreign navy brings the pieus aid-A navy of crusaders, mostly English. See p. 408.

Yet first, the cause the same, on Tago's shore
They dye their maiden swords in Pagan gore.
Proud stood the Moor on Lisbon's warlike towers,
From Lisbon's walls they drive the Moorish powers:
Amid the thickest of the glorious sight,
Lo, Henry falls, a gallant German knight,
A martyr falls: That holy tomb behold,
There waves the blossom'd palm the boughs of gold:
O'er Henry's grave the sacred plant arose,
And from the leaves, heaven's gift, gay health redundant shows.

Aloft, unfurl; the valiant Paulus cries,
Instant new wars on new-spread ensigns rise.
In robes of white behold a priest padvance!
His sword in splinters smites the Moorish lance:
Arronchez won revenges Lira's fall:
And lo, on fair Savilia's batter'd wall,
How boldly calm amid the crashing spears,
That hero-form the Lusian standard rears.
There bleeds the war on fair Vandalia's plain:
Lo, rushing through the Moors o'er hills of slain still to be seen in the Monastery of St. Vincent, but without the palm.

And from the leaves—This Legend is mentioned by some ancient Portuguese chronicles. Homer would have availed himself, as Camoens has done, of a tradition so enthusiastical, and characteristic of the age. Henry was a native of Bonneville near Cologn. His tomb, says Castera, is

P In robes of aubite behold a priest advance.

Theotonius, prior of the regulars of St.
Augustine of Conymbra. Some ancient Chronicles relate this circumstance as mentioned by Camoens. Modern writers affert, that he never quitted his breviary. Castera.

The hero rides, and proves by genuine claim The fon of Egas 4, and his worth the same. Pierced by his dart the standard-bearer dies; Beneath his feet the Moorish standard lies: High o'er the field, behold the glorious blaze! The victor-youth the Lusian flag displays, Lo, while the moon through midnight azure rides, From the high wall adown his spear-staff glides The dauntless Gerrald: in his left he' bears Two watchmen's heads, his right the faulchion rears: The gate he opens, swift from ambush rise His ready bands, the city falls his prize: Evora still the grateful honour pays, Her banner'd flag the mighty deed displays: There frowns the hero; in his left he bears The two cold heads, his right the faulchion rears. Wrong'd by his king, and burning for 'revenge, Behold his arms that proud Castilian change;

Moniz, and was fon of Egas Moniz, celebrated for the furrender of himself and family to the king of Castile, as already mentioned.

of rank, who, in order to avoid the legal punishment to which several crimes rendered him obnoxious, put himself at the head of a party of Freebooters. Tiring however of that life, he resolved to reconcile himself to his sovereign by some noble action. Full of this idea, one evening he entered Evora, which then belonged to the Moors. In the night he killed the centinels of one of the gates, which he opened to his companions, who foon became masters of the place. This exploit had its desired effect. The king pardoned Gerrald, and made him governor of Evora. A knight with a sword in one hand, and two heads in the other, from that time became the armorial bearing of the city." Castera.

the city." Castera.

* Wrong'd by bis king—Don Pedro Fernando de Castro, injured by the family of Lara, and denied redress by the king of Castile, took the infamous revenge of bearing arms against his native country. At the head of a Moorish army he committed several outrages in Spain; but was totally defeated in Portugal.

The Moorish buckler on his breast he bears, And leads the fiercest of the Pagan spears. Abrantes falls beneath his raging force, And now to Tagus bends his furious course. Another fate he met on Tagus' shore, Brave Lopez from his brows the laurels tore; His bleeding army strew'd the thirsty ground, And captive chains the rageful Leader bound. Resplendant far that holy chief behold! Aside he throws the sacred staff of gold And wields the spear of steel. How bold advance The numerous Moors, and with the rested lance Hem round the trembling Lusians. Calm and bold Still towers the priest, and lo, the skies ' unfold: Cheer'd by the vision brighter than the day The Lusians trample down the dread array Of Hagar's legions: on the reeking plain Low with their flaves four haughty kings lie flain. In vain Alcazar rears her brazen walls, Before his rushing host Alcazar falls. There, by his altar, now the hero shines, And with the warrior's palm his mitre twines.

fly, when, at the prayers of the Bishop, a venerable old man, cloathed in white, with a red cross on his breast, appeared in the air. The miracle dispelled the fears of the Portuguese; the Moors were deseated, and the conquest of Alcazar crowned the victory." Castera.

nand lo, the skies unfold—" According to some ancient Portuguese histories, Don Matthew, Bishop of Lisbon, in the reign of Alonzo I. attempted to reduce Alcazar, then in possession of the Moors. His troops being suddenly surrounded by a numerous party of the enemy, were ready to

That chief behold: though proud Castilia's host He leads, his birth shall Tagus ever boast. As a pent flood bursts headlong o'er the strand So pours his fury o'er Algarbia's land: Nor rampired town, nor castled rock afford The refuge of defence from Payo's sword. By night-veil'd art proud Sylves falls his prey, And Tavila's high walls at middle day Fearless he scales: her streets in blood deplore The seven brave hunters murder'd by the "Moor. These three bold knights how dread! Thro' Spain and * France At just and tournay with the tilted lance Victors they rode: Castilia's court beheld Her peers o'erthrown; the peers with rancour swell'd: The bravest of the Three their swords surround; Brave Ribeir strews them vanquish'd o'er the ground. Now let thy thoughts, all wonder and on fire, That darling son of warlike Fame admire, these brave unsortunates, by the sack of Tavila, where his just rage put the garrison to the sword." Castera.

* These Three bold knights bow dread!—

The fewen brawe hunters murder'd by the Moor "During a truce with the Moors, fix cavaliers of the order of St. James were, while on a hunting party, furrounded and killed by a numerous body of the Moors. During the fight, in which the gentlemen fold their lives dear, a common carter, named Garcias Rodrigo, who chanced to pass that way, came generously to their affistance, and lost his life along with them. The Poet, in giving all seven the same title, shews us that virtue constitutes true nobility. Don Payo de Correa, grand master of the order of St. James, revenged the death of Nothing can give us a stronger picture of the romantic character of their age, than the manners of these champions, who were gentlemen of birth; and who, in the true spirit of knight-errantry, went about from court to court in quest of adventures. Their names were, Gonçalo Ribeiro; Ferdando Martinez de Santarene; and Vasco Anez, soster-brother to Mary, queen of Castile, daughter of Alonzo IV. of Portugal.

Prostrate at proud Castilia's monarch's feet His land lies trembling: lo, the nobles meet: Softly they feem to breathe, and forward bend The servile neck; each eye distrusts his friend; Fearful each tongue to speak; each bosom cold: When colour'd with stern rage, erect and bold The hero rises; Here no foreign throne shall fix its base; my native king alone Shall reign — Then rushing to the fight he leads; Low vanquish'd in the dust Castilia bleeds. Where proudest hope might deem it vain to dare, God led him on, and crown'd the glorious war. Though fierce as numerous are the hosts that dwell By Betis' stream, these hosts before him fell. The fight behold: while absent from his bands, Prest on the step of slight his army stands, To call the chief an herald speeds away: Low on his knees the gallant chief furvey! He pours his foul, with lifted hands implores, And heaven's affifting arm, inspired, adores. Panting and pale the herald urges speed: With holy trust of victory decreed, Careless he answers, Nothing urgent calls: And foon the bleeding foe before him falls. To Numa thus the pale Patricians fled; The hostile squadrons o'er the kingdom spread,

They cry; unmoved the holy king replies,
And I, behold, am offering * facrifice!

Earnest I see thy wondering eyes enquire

Who this illustrious chief, his country's sire?

The Lusian Scipio well might speak his ' fame,
But nobler Nunio shines a greater name:

On earth's green bosom, or on ocean grey,
A greater never shall the Sun survey.

Known by the filver cross and sable * shield
Two knights of Malta there command the field;
From Tago's banks they drive the fleecy prey,
And the tired ox lows on his weary way:
When, as the falcon through the forest glade
Darts on the leveret, from the brown-wood shade
Darts Roderic on their rear; in scatter'd flight
They leave the goodly herds the victor's right.

* And I, behold, am offering faerifice— This line, the fimplicity of which, I think, contains great dignity, is adopted from Fanshaw,

And I, ye see, am offering sacrifice. who has here catched the spirit of the original:

A quem lhe a dura nova estava dando, Pois eu responde esteu sacrisicando.

i. e. To whom when they told the dreadful tidings, "And I, he replies, am facrificing." The piety of Numa was crowned with victory. Vid. Plut. in vit. Num.

The Lusian Scipio well might speak his which Camoens introduces the name of this truly great man. Il va, fays he, le nommer tout à l'heure avec une udresse et une magnificence dinne d'un si heau suiet.

cence digne d'un si beau sujet ant magnificence digne d'un si beau sujet.

2 Tavo knights of Malta—These knights were sirst named knights Hospitallars of St. John of Jerusalem, afterwards knights of Rhodes, from whence they were driven to Messina, ere Malta was assigned to them, where they now remain. By their oath of knighthood they are bound to protect the Holy Sepulchre from the prosantion of Insidels; and immediately on taking this oath, they retire to their colleges, where they live on their revenues in all the idleness of monkish luxury. Their original habit was black with a white cross; their arms Gules, a Cross, Argent.

Again, behold, in gore he bathes his fword;
His captive friend, to liberty reftor'd,
Glows to review the cause that wrought his woe,
The cause, his loyalty as taintless snow.
Here Treason's well-earn'd meed allures thine eyes,
Low groveling in the dust the Traytor dies;
Great Elvas gave the blow: Again, behold,
Chariot and steed in purple slaughter roll'd:
Great Elvas triumphs; wide o'er Xeres' plain
Around him reeks the noblest blood of Spain.

Here Lisbon's spacious harbour meets the view;
How vast the soe's, the Lusian sleet how sew!
Casteel's proud war-ships, circling round, enclose
The Lusian galleys; through their thundering rows,
Fierce pressing on, Pereira searless rides,
His hooked irons grasp the Amm'ral's sides:
Consusion maddens; on the dreadless knight
Castilia's navy pours its gather'd might:

mounted the throne of Portugal, one Vasco Porcallo was governor of Villaviciosa. Roderic de Landroal and his friend Alvarez Cuytado, having discovered that he was in the interest of the king of Castile, drove him from his town and fortress. On the establishment of king John, Porcallo had the art to obtain the favour of that prince, but no sooner was he re-instated in the garrison, than he delivered it up to the Castilians; and plundered the house of Cuytado, whom, with his wise, he made prisoner; and under a numerous party, ordered to be sent to Olivença. Roderic de Landroal hearing of this. attacked and descated the escort, and set his friend at liberty. Castera.

Here treasen's weell-earn'd meed ailures thine eyes—While the kingdom of Portugal was divided, some holding with John the newly elected king, and others with the king of Castile, Roderic Marin, governor of Campo-Major, declared for the latter. Fernando d'Elvas endeavoured to gain him to the interest of his native prince, and a conference, with the usual affurances of safety, was agreed to. Marin, at this meeting, seized upon Elvas, and sent him prisoner to his castle. Elvas having recovered his liberty, a sew days after met his enemy in the field, whom in his turn he made captive; and the traiterous Marin, notwithstanding the endeavours of their captain to save his life, met the reward of his treason from the soldiers of Elvas. Partly from Castera.

Pereira dies, their felf-devoted prev. And fafe the Lusian galleys speed away.

Lo, where the lemon-trees from yon green hill Throw their cool shadows o'er the chrystal rill; There twice two hundred fierce Castilian foes Twice eight, forlorn, of Lusian race enclose: Forlorn they feem; but taintless flow'd their blood From those three hundred who of old withstood. Withstood, and from a thousand Romans tore The victor-wreath, what time the 4 shepherd bore The leader's staff of Lusus: equal flame Inspired these few, their victory the same. Though twenty lances brave each fingle fpear, Never the foes superior might to fear Is our inheritance, our native right, Well tried, well proved in many a dreadful fight.

That dauntless earl behold; on Libya's coast, Far from the succour of the Lusian host,

· And Safe the Lusian galleys speed away. -A numerous fleet of the Castilians being on their way to lay fiege to Liston, Ruy Pereyra, the Portuguse commander, seeing no possibility of victory, boldly attacked the Spanish admiral. The sury of his onset put the Castilians in disorder, and allowed the Portugusee galleys a safe escape. In this brave piece of service the gallant Pereyra lost his life. Column lost his life. Castera.

were obliged at times to make fallies to the bottom of the hill in quest of it. Seventeen Portuguese thus employed, were one day at-tacked by sour hundred of the enemy. They made a brave defence and happy retreat into ^{4 —} the shepherd—Viriatus.

c—equal slame inspired these few—
The Castilians having laid siege to Almada, a fortress on a mountain near Lisbon, the garrison, in the utmost distress for water, their fortress. Castera.

1 Far from the succour of the Lusian host—
When Alonzo V. took Ceuta, Don Pedro de
Menezes, was the only officer in the army who was willing to become governor of that fortress; which, on account of the uncertainty of fuccour from Portugal, and the earnest desire of the Moors to regain it, was deemed untenable. He gallantly defended his post in two severe sieges.

Twice hard besieged he holds the Ceutan towers Against the banded might of Afric's powers.

That other earl;—behold the port he bore, So trod stern Mars on Thracia's hills of yore.

What groves of spears Alcazar's gates surround!

There Afric's nations blacken o'er the ground.

A thousand ensigns glittering to the day

The waining moon's slant silver horns display.

In vain their rage; no gate, no turret falls,

The brave De Vian guards Alcazar's walls.

In hopeless conslict lost, his king appears;

Amid the thickest of the Moorish spears

Plunges bold Vian: in the glorious strife

He dies, and dying saves his sovereign's life.

Illustrious, lo, two brother-heroes shine,
Their birth, their deeds, adorn the royal line;
To every king of princely Europe known ',
In every court the gallant Pedro shone.
The glorious ' Henry — kindling at his name
Behold my sailors' eyes all sparkle slame!

one day having rode out from Ceuta with a few attendants was attacked by a numerous party of the Moors, when De Vian, and some others under him, at the expence of their own lives, purchased the safe retreat of their sovereign.

f tave brother-heroes spine—The sons of John I. Don Pedro was called the Ulysses of his age, on account both of his eloquence and his voyages. He visited almost every court of Europe, but he principally distinguished himself in Germany; where, under the standards of the emperor Sigismond, he signalised his valour in the war against the Turks. Castera.

war against the Turks. Cajeera.

8 The glerious Henry—In pursuance of the reason assigned in the presace, the translator has here taken the liberty to make a transposition in the order of his author. In Camoens, Don Pedro de Menezes, and his son De Vian, conclude the description of the pictured ensigns. Don Henry, the greatest

336

Henry the chief, who first, by heaven inspired, To deeds unknown before, the failor fired, The conscious sailor left the fight of shore, And dared new oceans never ploughed before.

man perhaps that ever Portugal produced, has certainly the best title to close this procession of the Lusian heroes. And as he was the father of navigation, particularly of the voyage of Gama, to fum up the narrative with his encomium, it may be hoped has even fome critical propriety. It remains now to make a few observations on this seeming episode of Camoens. The shield of Achilles has had many imitators, some in one degree, others in another. The imitation of Ariosto, in the xxx111 canto of his Orlando Furioso, is most fancifully ingenious; and on this undoubtedly the Portuguese poet had his eye. Pharamond king of France, having resolved to conquer Italy, desires the friendship of Arthur king of Britain. Arthur sends Merlin the magician to assist him with advice. Merlin by his supernatural art raises a sumptuous hall, on the sides of which all the future wars, unfortunate to the French in their invasions of Italy, are painted in colours exceeding the pencils of the greatest masters. A description of these pictures, an episode much longer than this of Camoens, is given to the heroine Bradamant, by the knight who kept the cattle of Sir Tristram, the place where the inchanted hall remained. But though the poetry be pleasing, the whole fiction, unless to amuse the warlike lady, has nothing to do with the action of the poem. Unity of defign however, is neither claimed by Ariosto in the exordium of his work, nor attempted in the execution. An examination therefore of the conduct of Homer and Virgil will be more applicable to Camoens. To give a landscape of the face of the country which is the scene of action, or to describe the heroes and their armour, are the becoming ornaments of an epic poem. Milton's beautiful description of Eden, and the admirable painting of the shield of Achilles, are like the embroidery of a fuit of cloaths, a part of the subject, and injure not the graceful-ness of the make; or in other words, destroy not the unity of the action. Yet let it be observed, that admirable as they are, the pictures on the shield of Achilles, considered by themselves, have no relation to the action of the Iliad. If fix of the apartments may be faid to rouse the hero to war, the other fix may with equal justice be called an obvious admonition or a charge to turn huf-bandman. In that part of the Eneid where Virgil greatly improves upon his master, in the visions of his suture race which Anchises gives to Eneas in Elyfium, the business of the poem is admirably fustained, and the hero is inspired to encounter every danger on the view of so great a reward. The description of the shield of Encas however is less connected with the conduct of the fable. Virgil indeed intended that his poem should contain all the honours of his country, and has therefore charged the shield of his hero with what parts of the Roman history were omitted in the vision of Elysium. But so foreign are these pictures to the war with Turnus, that the poet himself tells us Eneas was ignorant of the history which they contained.

Talia, per clypeum Vulcani, dona parentis Miratur: rerumque ignarus imagine gaudet.

These observations, which the translator believes have escaped the critics, were fuggested to him by the conduct of Camoens, whose design, like that of Virgil, was to write a poem which might contain all the triumphs of his country. As the shield of Eneas sup-plies what could not be introduced in the vision of Elysium, so the ensigns of Gama complete the purpose of the third and fourth Lusiads. The use of that long episode, the conversation with the king of Melinda, and its connection with the subject, have been already observed. The seeming episode of the pictures, while it fulfils the promise,

And all my country's wars the song adornis also admirably connected with the conduct of the poem. The Indians naturally desire to be informed of the country, the history,

The various wealth of every distant land

He bade his fleets explore, his fleets command.

The ocean's great Discoverer he shines;

Nor less his honours in the martial lines:

The painted flag the cloud-wrapt siege displays,

There Ceuta's rocking wall its trust betrays.

Black yawns the breach; the point of many a spear Gleams through the smoke; loud shouts assound the ear.

Whose step first trod the dreadful pass? whose sword Hew'd its dark way, first with the soe begored?

'Twas thine, O glorious Henry, first to dare

The dreadful pass, and thine to close the war.

and power of their foreign visitors, and Paulus sets it before their eyes. In every progression of the scenery the business of the poem advances. The regent and his attendants are struck with the warlike grandeur and power of the strangers, and to accept of their friendship, or to prevent the forerunners of so martial a nation to carry home the tidings of the discovery of India, becomes the great object of their consideration. And from the passions of the Indians and Moors, thus agitated, the great catastrophe of the Lusiad is both naturally and artfully produced.

As every reader is not a critic in poetry, to fome perhaps the expressions

And the tired ox lows on his weary way ———————————————loud shouts assound the ear———

And the abrupt speech of an enraged warrior, ascribed to a picture,

Here no foreign throne
Shall fix its base, my native king alone Shall reign

may appear as unwarrantable. This however, let them be affured, is the language of the genuine spirit of poetry, when the productions of the fister muse are the object of description. Let one very bold instance of this appear in the picture of the dance of the youths and maidens on the shield of Achilles, thus faithfully rendered by Mr. Pope;

Now all at once they rife, at once descend, With well-taught feet: now shape, in oblique ways,

Confus'dly regular, the moving maze:
Now forth at once, too swift for light they spring,
And undistinguish'd blend the flying ring:
So whirls a wheel, in giddy circles tost,
And rapid as it runs, the single spokes are lost.
The gazing multitudes admire around:
Two active tumblers in the center bound;
Now high, now low, their pliant limbs they

And gen'ral fongs the sprightly revel end.

IL. XVIII.

Sometimes when describing a picture, poetry will say, the figures feem to move, to tremble, or to sing. Homer has once or twice, on the shield of his hero, given this hint how to understand him. But often to repeat the qualification were quite opposite to the bold and free spirit of poets, which delights in personification, and in giving life and passion to every thing it describes. It is owing to the superior force of this spirit, together with the more beautiful colouring of its landscape-views, that the shield of Achilles, in poetical merit, so greatly excels the buckler of Encas, though the divine workman of the latter, had the former as a pattern before him.

Taught

Taught by his might, and humbled in her gore The boastful pride of Afric tower'd no more.

Numerous though these, more numerous warriors shine
Th' illustrious glory of the Lusian line.
But ah, forlorn, what shame to barbarous b pride!
Friendless the master of the pencil died;
Immortal same his deathless labours gave;
Poor man, He sunk neglected to the grave!

The gallant Paulus faithful thus explain'd
The various deeds the pictured flags contain'd.
Still o'er and o'er, and still again untired,
The wondering Regent of the wars enquired;
Still wondering heard the various pleasing tale,
Till o'er the decks cold sighed the evening gale:
The falling darkness dimm'd the eastern shore,
And twilight hover'd o'er the billows hoar
Far to the west, when with his noble band
The thoughtful Regent sought his native strand.

ginary painter, the Lusian poet gives us the picture of his own, and resentment wrung this impropriety from him. The spirit of the complaint however is preserved in the translation. The couplet,

Immortal fame his deathless labours gave; Poor man, He sunk neglected to the grave! is not in the original. It is the sigh of indignation over the unworthy sate of the unhappy Camoens.

h But ab, forlorn, what shame to barbarous pride—In the original,

Mas faltamlhes pincel, faltamlhes cores, Honra, premio, favor, que as artes crião.

[&]quot;But the pencil was wanting, colours were wanting, honour, reward, favour, the nourishers of the arts." This seemed to the translator as an impropriety, and contrary to the purpose of the whole speech of Paulus, which was to give the Catual a high idea of Portugal. In the fate of the ima-

O'er the tall mountain-forest's waving boughs Aslant the new moon's slender horn's arose: Near her pale chariot shone a twinkling star, And, fave the murmuring of the wave afar. Deep-brooding filence reign'd; each labour closed, In sleep's foft arms the fons of toil reposed. And now no more the moon her glimpses shed, A fudden black-wing'd cloud the sky o'erspread, A fullen murmur through the woodland groan'd, In woe-fwoln fighs the hollow winds bemoan'd; Borne on the plaintive gale a pattering shower, Increased the horrors of the evil hour. Thus when the great Earthshaker rocks the ground, He gives the prelude in a dreary found; O'er Nature's face a horrid gloom he throws, With dismal note the cock unusual crows, A shrill-voiced howling trembles thro' the air As passing ghosts were weeping in despair; In dismal yells the dogs confess their fear, And shivering own some dreadful presence near. So lower'd the night, the fullen howl the same, And mid the black-wing'd gloom stern Bacchus came; The form and garb of Hagar's fon he took, The ghost-like aspect, and the threatening look.

trux aspeclus et vox terribilis, of a sierce threatening aspect, voice, and demeanour.

¹ The ghost-like aspett and the threatening look.—Mohammed, by all historians, is described as of a pale livid complexion, and

Then o'er the pillow of a furious priest, Whose burning zeal the Koran's lore profest, Revealed he stood conspicuous in a dream, His femblance shining as the moon's pale gleam: And guard, he cries, my fon, O timely guard, Timely defeat the dreadful snare prepar'd: And canst thou careless unaffected sleep, While these stern lawless rovers of the deep Fix on thy native shore a foreign throne, Before whose steps thy latest race shall groan! He spoke; cold horror shook the Moorish priest; He wakes, but soon reclines in wonted rest: An airy phantom of the slumbering brain He deem'd the vision; when the Fiend again, With sterner mien and siercer accent spoke; Oh faithless! worthy of the foreign yoke! And knowest thou not thy prophet sent by heaven, By whom the Koran's facred lore was given, God's chiefest gift to men: And must I leave The bowers of Paradife, for you to grieve, For you to watch, while thoughtless of your woe Ye fleep, the careless victims of the foe; The foe, whose rage will soon with cruel joy, If unopposed, my facred shrines destroy. Then while kind heaven th' auspicious hour bestows, Let every nerve their infant strength oppose.

When foftly ushered by the milky k dawn
The sun first rises o'er the daisied lawn
His silver lustre, as the shining dew
Of radiance mild, unhurt the eye may view:
But when on high the noon-tide slaming rays
Give all the force of living fire to blaze,
A giddy darkness strikes the conquer'd sight,
That dares in all his glow the Lord of light.
Such, if on India's soil the tender shoot
Of these proud cedars six the stubborn root,
Such shall your power before them sink decay'd,
And India's strength shall wither in their shade.

He spoke; and instant from his vot'ry's bed Together with repose, the dæmon sled;

* When foftly usher'd by the milky dawn The sun first rises.—" I deceive myself greatly, says Castera, if this simile is not the most noble and the most natural that can be found in any poem. It has been imitated by the Spanish comedian, the illustrious Lopez de Vega, in his comedy of Orpheus and Eurydice, Act I. Scene I.

Como mirar puede ser El sol al amanecer, I quando se enciende, no."

Castera adds a very loose translation of these Spanish lines in French verse. The literal English is, As the sun may be beheld at its rising, but when i lustriously kindled, cannot. Naked however as this is, the imitation of Camoens is evident. As Castera is so very bold in his encomium of this since simile of the sun, it is but justice to add his translation of it, together with the original Portuguese, and the translation of Fanshaw. Thus the French translator.

Les yeux peuvent soûtenir la clarté du soleil naissant, mais lorsqu'il s'est avancé dans sa earriere lumineuse, & que ses rayons répandent les ardeurs du midi, on tacheroit en vain de Penvoisager; un prompt aveuglement seroit le prix de cette audace.

Thus elegantly in the original;

Em quanto he fraca a força desta gente, Ordena como em tudo se resista, Porque quando o Sol sae, sacilmente Se pode nelle por a aguda vista: Porem depois que sobe claro, & ardente, Se a agudeza dos olhos o conquista Tao cega sica, quando sicareis, Se raizes criar lhe nao tolheis.

And thus humbled by Fanshaw;

Now whilst this people's strength is not yet knit,
Think how ye may resist them by all ways.
For when the Sun is in his nonage yit,
Upon his morning beauty Men may gaze;
But let him once up to his zenith git,
He strikes them blind with his meridian rays;
So blind will ye be, if ye look not too't,
If ye permit these cedars to take root.

Again

Again cold horror shook the zealot's frame. And all his hatred of Messiah's name Burn'd in his venom'd heart, while veil'd in night Right to the palace sped the dæmon's flight. Sleepless the king he found in dubious thought; His conscious fraud a thousand terrors brought: All gloomy as the hour, around him stand With haggard looks the hoary magi 1 band; To trace what fates on India's wide domain Attend the rovers from unheard of Spain, Prepared in dark futurity to prove The hell-taught rituals of infernal Jove: Muttering their charms and spells of dreary sound, With naked feet they beat the hollow ground; Blue gleams the altar's flame along the walls, With difmal hollow groans the victim falls; With earnest eyes the priestly band explore The entrails throbbing in the living gore. And lo, permitted by the power divine, The hovering damon gives the dreadful " fign.

The Brahmins are never among moderns writers called Magi.

⁻Around bim stand With baggard looks the hoary magi band-Or the Brahmins, the diviners of India Ammianus Marcellinus, l. 23, fays, that the Persian Magi derived their knowledge from the Brachmanes of India. And Arrianus, l. 7. expresly gives the Brahmins the name of Magi. The Magi of India, fays he, told Alexander on his pretensions to divinity, that in every thing he was like other man. in every thing he was like other men, except that he took less rest, and did more mischief.

The howering damon gives the dreadful fign.—This has an allusion to the truth of history. Barros relates, that an Augur being brought before the Zamorim, "Em bum vaso de agua l'he mostrara bunas nuos, que vin ham de muy longe para a India, e que a gente d'ellas feria total des ruiçam dos Mou-ros de aquellas partes. In a vessel of watez he shewed him some ships which from a

Here furious War her gleamy faulchion draws,
Here lean ribb'd Famine writhes her falling jaws;
Dire as the fiery pestilential star
Darting his eyes, high on his trophied car
Stern Tyranny sweeps wide o'er India's ground,
On vulture wings fierce Rapine hovers round;
Ills after ills, and India's fetter'd might,
Th' eternal yoke——loud shrieking at the "fight
The starting wizards from the altar fly,
And silent horror glares in every eye:
Pale stands the Monarch, lost in cold dismay,
And now impatient waits the lingering day.

With gloomy aspect rose the lingering dawn,
And dropping tears slow'd slowly o'er the lawn;
The Moorish Priest with fear and vengeance fraught,
Soon as the light appear'd his kindred sought;

great distance came to India, the people of which would effect the utter subversion of the Moors." Camoens has certainly chosen a more poetical method of describing this divination, a method in the spirit of Virgil; nor in this is he inferior to his great master. The supernatural slame which seizes on Lavinia, while affisting at the facrifice, alone excepted, every other part of the augury of Latinus, and his dream in the Albunean forest, whither he went to consult his ancestor the god Faunus, in dignity and poetical colouring, cannot come in comparison with the divination of the Magi, and the appearance of the Dæmon in the dream of the Moorish priest.

n Th' eternal yoke—This picture, it may perhaps be said, is but a bad compliment to the heroes of the Lusiad, and the fruits of their discovery. A little consideration however will vindicate Camoens. It is the Dæmon and the enemies of the Portuguese who procure this divination; every thing in it is dreadful, on purpose to determine the Zamorim to destroy the sleet of Gama. In a former prophecy of the conquest of India, (when the Catual describes the sculpture of the royal palace) our poet has been careful to ascribe the happiest effects to the discovery of his heroes:

Beneath their sway majestic, wife, and mild, Proud of her victors' laws thrice happier India smiled.

Would to God this may come to pass! But the prophecy of the Devil has hitherto, alas, been the true one. Appall'd and trembling with ungenerous fear, In fecret council met, his tale they hear; As check'd by terror or impell'd by hate Of various means they ponder and debate, Against the Lusian train what arts employ, By force to flaughter, or by fraud destroy; Now black, now pale, their bearded cheeks appear, As boiling rage prevail'd, or boding fear; Beneath their shady brows their eye-balls roll, Nor one foft gleam bespeaks the generous soul; Through quivering lips they draw their panting breath, While their dark fraud decrees the works of death; Nor unresolved the power of gold to try Swift to the lordly CATUAL's gate they hie -Ah, what the wisdom, what the sleepless care Efficient to avoid the traytor's fnare! What human power can give a king to know The smiling aspect of the lurking foe! So let the tyrant ' plead --- the patriot king Knows men, knows whence the patriot virtues spring; From inward worth, from conscience firm and bold, Not from the man whose honest name is fold, Lured was the Regent with the Moorish gold, is happily introduced by the manly declamatory reflections which immediately precede it.

[•] So let the tyrant plead — In this short declamation, a seeming excrescence, the bufiness of the poem in reality is carried on. The Zamorim, and his prime minister, the Catual, are artfully characterised in it; and the assertion

He hopes that virtue, whose unalter'd weight Stands fixt, unveering with the storms of state.

Lured was the Regent with the Moorish gold,
And now agreed their fraudful course to hold,
Swift to the king the Regent's steps they tread;
The king they found o'erwhelm'd in sacred dread.
The word they take, their ancient deeds relate,
Their ever faithful service of the state;
For ages long, from shore to distant shore
For thee our ready keels the traffic bore:

P The Moors—their ancient deeds relate,

Their ever faithful service of the state-An explanation of the word Moor is here necesfary. When the East afforded no more field for the fword of the conqueror, the Saracens, assisted by the Moors, who had embraced their religion, laid the finest countries in Europe in blood and defolation. As their various embarkations were from the empire of Morocco, the Europeans gave the name of Moors to all the professors of the Mohammedan religion. In the fame manner the eastern nations blended all the armies of the Crusaders under one appellation, and the Franks, of whom the army of Godfrey was mostly composed, became their common name for all the inhabitants of the West. The appellation even reached China. When the Portuguese first arrived in that Empire, the Chinese softening the r into I, called both them and their cannon, by the name of F. lanks, a name which is still retained at Canton, and other parts of the Chinese dominions. Before the arrival of Gama, as already observed, all the traffic of the East, from the Ethiopian fide of Africa to China, was in the hands of Arabian Mohammedans, who, without incorporating with the pagan natives, had their colonies established in every country commodious for commerce. These the Portuguese called Moors; and at present the Mohammedans of India, are called the Moors of Hindostan by the latest of our English writers. The intelligence these Moors gave to one another, relative to the actions of Gama, the general terror with which they beheld the appearance of Europeans, whose rivalship they dreaded as the destruc-tion of their power; the various frauds and arts they employed to prevent the return of one man of Gama's fleet to Europe, and their threat to withdraw from the dominions of the Zamorim, are all according to the truth of history. The speeches of the Zamorim and of Gama, which follow, are also founded in truth. They are only poetical paraphrases of the speeches ascribed by Osorius, to the Indian sovereign and the Portuguese admiral. Where the subject was so happily adapted to the epic Muse, to neglect it would have been reprehensible: and Camoens, not unjustly, thought, that the reality of his hero's adventures gave a dignity to his poem. When Gama, in his difcourse with the king of Melinda, finishes the description of his voyage, he makes a spirited apostrophe to Homer and Virgil; and afferts, that the adventures which he had actually experienced, greatly exceeded all the wonders of their fables. Camoens also, in other parts of the poem, avails himfelf of the fame affertion.

For thee we dared each horror of the wave; Whate'er thy treasures boast our labours gave. And wilt thou now confer our long-earn'd due, Confer thy favour on a lawless crew? The race they boaft, as tygers of the wold Bear their proud sway by justice uncontroull'd. Yet for their crimes, expell'd that bloody home, These, o'er the deep, rapacious plunderers roam. Their deeds we know; round Afric's shores they came And spread, where'er they past, devouring slame; Mozambic's towers, enroll'd in sheets of fire, Blazed to the sky, her own funereal pyre. Imperial Calicut shall feel the same, And these proud state-rooms feed the funeral slame; While many a league far round, their joyful eyes Shall mark old ocean reddening to the skies. Such dreadful fates, o'er thee, O king, depend, Yet with thy fall our fate shall never blend: Ere o'er the east arise the second dawn Our fleets, our nation from thy land withdrawn, In other climes, beneath a kinder reign Shall fix their port: yet may the threat be vain! If wifer thou with us thy powers employ Soon shall our powers the robber-crew destroy, By their own arts and fecret deeds o'ercome Here shall they meet the fate escaped at home.

While

While thus the Priest detain'd the Monarch's ear,
His cheeks confest the quivering pulse of sear.
Unconscious of the worth that fires the brave,
In state a monarch, but in heart a slave,
He view'd brave VASCO and his generous train,
As his own passions stamp'd the conscious stain:
Nor less his rage the fraudful Regent fired;
And valiant GAMA's sate was now conspired.

Ambassadors from India GAMA sought, And oaths of peace, for oaths of friendship brought; The glorious tale, 'twas all he wish'd, to tell; So Ilion's fate was seal'd when Hector fell.

Again convoked before the Indian throne,
The Monarch meets him with a rageful frown;
And own, he cries, the naked truth reveal,
Then shall my bounteous grace thy pardon seal.
Feign'd is the treaty thou pretend'st to bring,
No country owns thee, and thou own'st no king.
Thy life, long roving o'er the deep, I know,
A lawless robber, every man thy soe.
And think'st thou credit to thy tale to gain?
Mad were the sovereign, and the hope were vain,
Through ways unknown, from utmost western shore,
To bid his sleets the utmost east explore.

Yy

Great

Great is thy monarch, fo thy words declare; But sumptuous gifts the proof of greatness bear: Kings thus to kings their empire's grandeur shew; Thus prove thy truth, thus we thy truth allow. If not, what credence will the wife afford? What monarch trust the wandering seaman's word? No fumptuous gift Thou 9 bring'ft - Yet, though some crime Has thrown thee banish'd from thy native clime, (Such oft of old the hero's fate has been) Here end thy toils, nor tempt new fates unseen: Each land the brave man nobly calls his home: Or if, bold pyrates, o'er the deep you roam, Skill'd the dread storm to brave, O welcome here! Fearless of death or shame confess sincere: My Name shall then thy dread protection be, My captain Thou, unrivall'd on the sea.

Oh now, ye Muses, sing what goddess fired GAMA's proud bosom, and his lips inspired.

n No fumptuous gist Thou bring A.—" As the Portuguese did not expect to find any people but savages beyond the Cape of Good Hope, they only brought with them some preserves and confections, with trinkets of coral, of glass, and other trises. This opinion however deceived them. In Melinda and in Calicut they found civilized nations, where the arts flourished; who wanted nothing; who were possessed all the refinements and delicacies on which we value ourselves. The king of Melinda had the generosity to be contented with the present which Gama made; but the Zamorim, with a disdainful eye, beheld the gifts which were offered to him. The present was thus: Four mantles of scarlet, six hats adorned with feathers, sour chaplets of coral beads, twelve Turky carpets, seven drinking cups of brass, a chest of sugar, two barrels of oil, and two of honey. Castera.

Fair ACIDALIA, Love's celestial ' queen, The goddess of the fearless, graceful mien. Her graceful freedom on his look bestow'd. And all collected in his bosom glow'd. Sovereign, he cries, oft witness'd, well I know The rageful falshood of the Moorish foe, Their fraudful tales, from hatred bred, believed, Thine ear is poison'd, and thine eye deceived. What light, what shade the courtier's mirrour gives, That light, that shade the guarded king receives. Me hast thou view'd in colours not mine own, Yet bold I promise shall my truth be known. If o'er the seas a lawless pest I roam, A blood-stain'd exile from my native home, How many a fertile shore and beauteous isle, Where Nature's gifts unclaim'd, unbounded smile, Mad have I left, to dare the burning zone, And all the horrors of the gulphs unknown That roar beneath the axle of the world. Where ne'er before was daring fail unfurl'd! And have I left these beauteous shores behind, And have I dared the rage of every wind, That now breathed fire, and now came wing'd with frost, Lured by the plunder of an unknown coast?

straint. Acidalia, is one of the Names of Venus, in Virgil; derived from Acidalus, a fountain sacred to her in Bœotia.

Fair Acidalia, Love's celestial queen— Castera derives Acidalia from and is, which, he says, implies to act without fear or re-

Not thus the robber leaves his certain prey For the gay promise of a nameless day. Dread and stupendous, more than death-doom'd man Might hope to compas, more than wisdom plan, To thee my toils, to thee my dangers rise: Ah! Lisbon's kings behold with other eyes. Where virtue calls, where glory leads the way No dangers move them, and no toils difinay. Long have the kings of Lusus' daring race Resolved the limits of the deep to trace, Beneath the morn to ride the farthest waves, And pierce the farthest shore old Ocean laves. Sprung from the 'Prince, before whose matchless power The strength of Afric wither'd as a flower Never to bloom again, great Henry shone, Each gift of nature and of art his own; Bold as his fire, by toils on toils untired, To find the Indian shore his pride aspired. Beneath the stars that round the Hydra shine, And where fam'd Argo hangs the heavenly fign, Where thirst and fever burn on every gale The dauntless Henry rear'd the Lusian sail. Embolden'd by the meed that crown'd his toils, Beyond the wide-spread shores and numerous isles,

Where both the tropics pour the burning day,
Succeeding heroes forced th' exploring way;
That race which never view'd the Pleiad's car,
That barbarous race beneath the fouthern star,
Their eyes beheld—Dread roar'd the blast—the wave
Boils to the sky, the meeting whirlwinds rave
O'er the torn heavens; loud on their awe-struck ear
Great Nature seem'd to call, Approach not here——
At Lisbon's court they told their dread escape,
And from her raging tempests, named the 'Cape.

- "Thou fouthmost point," the joyful king exclaimed,
- " Cape of Good Hope, be thou for ever named!
- "Onward my fleets shall dare the dreadful way,,
- "And find the regions of the infant day."

 In vain the dark and ever-howling blast

 Proclaimed, This ocean never shall be past;

 Through that dread ocean, and the tempests' roar,

 My king commanded, and my course I bore.

 The pillar thus of deathless "fame, begun

 By other chiefs, beneath the rising sun led by the account, and with inexpreffible joy, fays the same author, he immediately named it the Cape of Good Hope.

"The pillar thus of deathless fame, begun

And from her raging tempests named the Cape.—Bartholomew Diaz, was the first who discovered the southmost point of Africa. He was driven back by the storms, which on these seas were thought always to continue, and which the learned of former ages, says Osorius, thought impassable. Diaz, when he related his voyage to John II. called the southmost point the Cape of Tempests. The expectation of the king, however, was kind-

The furthest pillar in they realm advance;
Breaking the element of molten tin,
Through horrid forms 1 lead to thee the dance.
FANSHAW.

In thy great realm now to the skies I raise,

The deathless pillar of my nation's praise.

Through these wild seas no costly gift I brought;

Thy shore alone and friendly peace I sought.

And yet to thee the noblest gift I bring

The world can boast, the friendship of my King.

And mark the word, his greatness shall appear

When next my course to India's strand I steer,

Such proofs I'll bring as never man before

In deeds of strife or peaceful friendship bore.

Weigh now my words, my truth demands the light,

For truth shall ever boast, at last, resistless might.

Boldly the Hero spake with brow severe,

Of fraud alike unconscious as of fear:

His noble confidence with truth imprest

Sunk deep, unwelcome, in the Monarch's breast,

Nor wanting charms his avarice to gain

Appear'd the commerce of illustrious Spain.

Yet as the sick man loaths the bitter draught,

Though rich with health he knows the cup comes fraught;

His health without it, self-deceiv'd, he weighs,

Now hastes to quast the drug, and now delays;

Reluctant thus as wavering passion veer'd,

The Indian Lord the dauntless Gama heard:

The Moorish threats yet sounding in his ear,
He acts with caution, and is led by fear.
With solemn pomp he bids his lords prepare
The friendly banquet, to the Regent's care
Commends brave GAMA, and with pomp retires:
The Regent's hearths awake the social fires;
Wide o'er the board the royal feast is spread,
And fair embroidered shines DE GAMA's bed.
The Regent's palace high o'erlook'd the bay
Where GAMA's black-ribb'd sleet at anchor "lay.

Ah, why the voice of ire and bitter woe
O'er Tago's banks, ye nymphs of Tagus, shew;
The flowery garlands from your ringlets torn,
Why wandering wild with trembling steps forlorn!
The Dæmon's rage you saw, and markt his slight
To the dark mansions of eternal night:
You saw how howling through the shades beneath
He waked new horrors in the realms of death.
What trembling tempests shook the thrones of hell,
And groan'd along her caves, ye Muses, tell.
The rage of bassled fraud, and all the fire
Of powerless hate, with tenfold slames conspire;

^{*} The Regent's palace high o'erlook'd the bay, Where Gama's black-ribb'd fleet at anchor lay.

[—]The refemblance of this couplet to many passages in Homer, must be obvious to the intelligent critic.

From every eye the tawney lightnings glare, And hell, illumined by the ghaftly flare, A drear blue gleam, in tenfold horror shews Her darkling caverns; from his dungeon rose Stern Mahomet, pale was his earthy hue, And from his eye-balls flash'd the lightnings blue; Convulsed with rage the dreadful Shade demands The last assistance of th' infernal bands. As when the whirlwinds, sudden bursting, bear Th' autumnal leaves high floating through the air; So rose the legions of th' infernal state, Dark Fraud, base Art, sierce Rage, and burning Hate: Wing'd by the Furies to the Indian strand They bend; the Dæmon leads the dreadful band, And in the bosoms of the raging Moors All their collected living strength he pours. One breast alone against his rage was steel'd, Secure in spotless Truth's celestial shield.

One evening past, another evening closed,
The Regent still brave GAMA's suit opposed;
The Lusian Chief his guarded guest detain'd,
With arts on arts, and vows of friendship seign'd.
His fraudful art, though veil'd in deep disguise,
Shone bright to GAMA's manner-piercing eyes.

As in the sun's bright 'beam the gamesome boy Plays with the shining steel or chrystal toy, Swift and irregular, by sudden starts,
The living ray with viewless motion darts,
Swift o'er the wall, the sloor, the roof, by turns
The sun-beam dances, and the radiance burns.
In quick succession thus a thousand views
The sapient Lusian's lively thought pursues;
Quick as the lightning every view revolves,
And, weighing all, fixt are his dread resolves.
O'er India's shore the sable night descends,
And Gama, now, secluded from his friends,

As in the fun's bright beam—Imitated from Virgil, who, by the fame similie, defcribes the sluctuation of the thoughts of Eneas, on the eve of the Latian war:

Laomedontius heros
Cuncta videns, magno curarum fluctuat æftu,
Atque animum nunc huc celerem, nunc dividit
illuc,

In partesque rapit varias, perque omnia versat. Sicut aquæ tremulum labris ubi lumen ahenis Sole repercussum, aut radiantis imagine Lunæ, Omnia pervolitat late loca: jamque suh auras Erigitur, summique serit laquearia tecti.

This way and that he turns his anxious mind, Thinks, and rejects the counfels he design'd; Explores himself in vain, in every part, And gives no rest to his distracted heart: So when the sun by day or moon by night strike on the polish'd brass their trembling light, The glitt'ning species here and there divide, And cast their dubious heams from side to side; Now on the walls, now on the pavement play, And to the cieling stass the glaring day.

Arioslo has also adopted this similie in the eighth book of his Orlando Furioso:

Qual d'acqua chiara il tremolante lume Dal Sol percossa, o da' notturni rai, Per gli ampli tetti và con lungo salto A destra, ed a sinistra, e basso, ed alto. So from a water clear, the trembling light Of Phoebus, or the filver ray of night, Along the spacious rooms with splendor plays, Now high, now low, and shifts a thousand ways.

HOOLE.

But the happiest circumstance belongs to Camoens. The velocity and various shiftings of the sun-beam, reslected from a piece of chrystal or polished steel in the hand of a boy, give a much stronger idea of the violent agitation and sudden shiftings of thought, than the image of the trembling light of the sun or moon reslected from a vessel of water. The brazen vessel however, and not the water, is only mentioned by Dryden. Nor must another inaccuracy pass unobserved. That the reslection of the moon stashed the glaring day is not countenanced by the original. The critic however, who, from the mention of these, will infer any disrespect to the name of Dryden, is, as critics often are, ignorant of the writer's meaning. A very different inference is intended: If so great a master as Dryden has erred, let the critic remember, that other translators are liable to fail, and that a sew inaccuracies ought, by no means, to be produced as the specimens of any composition.

356 THE LUSIAD. BOOK VIII.

Detain'd a captive in the room of state,
Anticipates in thought to-morrow's fate;
For just Mozaide no generous care delays,
And Vasco's trust with friendly toils repays.

We have already seen the warm encomium paid by Tasso to his cotemporary, Camoens. That great poet, the ornament of Italy, has also testified his approbation by several imitations of the Lusiad. Virgil, in no instance, has more closely copied Homer, than Tasso has imitated the appearance of Bacchus, or the evil Dæmon, in the dream of the Moorish priest. The enchanter Ismeno thus appears to the sleeping Solyman:

Soliman' Solimano, i tuoi silenti Riposi à miglior tempo homai riserva t Che sotto il giogo de straniere genti La patria, ove regnasti, ancor' e serva. In questa terra dormi, e non rammenti, Ch' insepolte de' tuoi l'ossa conserva? Ove si gran' vestigio e del tuo scorno, Tu neghittoso aspetti il novo giorno?

Thus elegantly translated by Mr. Hoole,

Oh! Solyman, regardless Chief, awake! In happier hours thy grateful slumber take: Beneath a foreign yoke thy subjects bend, And strangers o'er thy land their rule extend: Here dost thou sleep? here close thy careless eyes, While uninterr'd each lov'd associate lies? Here where thy same has selt the hostile foorn, Canst thou, unthinking, wait the rising morn?

THE

L U S I A D.

B O O K IX.

R E D rose the dawn; roll'd o'er the low'ring sky,
The scattering clouds of tawny purple sly.
While yet the day-spring struggled with the gloom,
The Indian Monarch sought the Regent's dome.
In all the luxury of Asian state
High on a star-gemm'd couch the Monarch sate;
Then on th' illustrious Captive, bending down
His eyes, stern darken'd with a threatening frown,
Thy truthless tale, he cries, thy art appears,
Confest inglorious by thy cautious fears.
Yet still if friendship, honest, thou implore,
Yet now command thy vessels to the shore:

Z z 2

Generous

Generous as to thy friends thy fails resign,
My will commands it, and the power is mine:
In vain thy art, in vain thy might withstands,
Thy sails, and rudders too, my will demands:
Such be the test, thy boasted truth to try,
Each other test depised, I fixt deny.
And has my Regent sued two days in vain!
In vain my mandate, and the captive chain!
Yet not in vain, proud Chief, Ourself shall sue
From thee the honour to my friendship due:
Ere force compel thee, let the grace be thine,
Our grace permits it, freely to resign,
Freely to trust our friendship, ere too late
Our injured honour fix thy dreadful fate.

While thus he spake his changeful look declared,
In his proud breast what starting passions warr'd.
No feature mov'd on GAMA's face was seen,
Stern he replies, with bold yet anxious mien,
In me my Sovereign represented see,
His state is wounded, and he speaks in me;
Unawed by threats, by dangers uncontroul'd,
The laws of nations bid my tongue be bold.
No more thy justice holds the righteous scale,
The arts of falshood and the Moors prevail;

Thy fails, and rudders too, my will demands—According to History. See the life of Gama in the Preface.

I fee the doom my favour'd foes decree, Yet, though in chains I stand, my fleet is free. The bitter taunts of scorn the brave disdain; Few be my words, your arts, your threats are vain. My Sovereign's fleet I yield not to your b fway; Safe shall my fleet to Lisboa's strand convey The glorious tale of all the toils I bore, Afric furrounded, and the Indian shore Discovered—These I pledged my life to gain, These to my country shall my life maintain. One wish alone my earnest heart desires, The fole impassion'd hope my breast respires; My finish'd labours may my Sovereign hear! Besides that wish, nor hope I know, nor fear. And lo, the victim of your rage I ' stand, And bare my bosom to the murderer's hand.

With lofty mien he spake. In stern disdain,

My threats, the Monarch cries, were never vain:

Swift give the sign——Swift as he spake, appear'd

The dancing streamer o'er the palace rear'd;

Instant another ensign distant rose,

Where, jutting through the flood, the mountain throws

The Malabar protests that he shall rot-In prison, if he send not for the ships. He (constant, and with noble anger hot) His haughty menace weighs not at two chips.

My Sovereign's fleet I yield not to your favay—The circumstance of Gama's refusing to put his fleet into the power of the Zamorim, is thus rendered by Fanshaw;

A ridge enormous, and on either fide Defends the harbours from the furious tide. Proud on his couch th' indignant Monarch fate, And awful filence fill'd the room of state. With secret joy the Moors, exulting, glow'd, And bent their eyes where GAMA's navy rode, Then, proudly heaved with panting hope, explore The wood-crown'd upland of the bending shore. Soon o'er the palms a mast's tall pendant flows, Bright to the fun the purple radiance glows; In martial pomp, far streaming to the skies, Vanes after vanes in swift succession rife, And through the opening forest-boughs of green The fails' white lustre moving on is seen; When fudden rushing by the point of land The bowsprits nod, and wide the sails expand; Full pouring on the fight, in warlike pride, Extending still the rising squadrons ride: O'er every deck, beneath the morning rays, Like melted gold the brazen spear-points blaze; Each prore furrounded with an hundred oars, Old Ocean boils around the crowded prores: And five times now in number GAMA's might, Proudly their boastful shouts provoke the fight; Far round the shore the ecchoing peal rebounds, Behind the hill an answering shout resounds:

Still by the point new-spreading sails appear, Till seven times GAMA's fleet concludes the rear. Again the shout triumphant shakes the bay; Form'd as a crescent, wedg'd in firm array, Their fleet's wide horns the Lusian ships inclasp, Prepared to crush them in their iron grasp. Shouts eccho shouts — with stern disdainful eyes The Indian King to manly GAMA cries, Not one of thine on Lisboa's shore shall tell The glorious tale, how bold thy heroes fell. With alter'd visage, for his eyes flash'd fire, God sent me here, and God's avengeful ire Shall smite thy perfidy, great Vasco cried, And humble in the dust thy withered pride. A prophet's glow inspired his panting breast, Indignant smiles the Monarch's scorn confest. Again deep silence fills the room of state, And the proud Moors, fecure, exulting wait: And now inclasping GAMA's in a ring; Their fleet nods on - loud whizzing from the string The black-wing'd arrows float along the sky, And rifing clouds the falling clouds supply. The lofty crowding spears that bristling stood. Wide o'er the galleys as an upright wood, Bend sudden, levell'd for the closing fight, The points wide-waving shed a gleamy light.

Elate with joy the king his aspect rears, And valiant GAMA, thrill'd with transport, hears His drums' bold rattling raise the battle sound; Eccho deep-toned hoarse vibrates far around; The shivering trumpets tear the shrill-voiced air, Quivering the gale, the flashing lightnings flare, The smoke rolls wide, and sudden bursts the roar, The lifted waves fall trembling, deep the shore Groans; quick and quicker blaze embraces blaze In flashing arms; louder the thunders raise Their roaring, rolling o'er the bended skies The burst incessant; awe-struck Eccho dies Faultering and deafen'd; from the brazen throats, Cloud after cloud, inroll'd in darkness, floats, Curling their fulphrous folds of fiery blue, Till their huge volumes take the fleecy hue, And rowl wide o'er the sky; wide as the sight Can measure heaven, slow rowls the cloudy white: Beneath, the smoky blackness spreads afar Its hovering wings, and veils the dreadful war Deep in its horrid breast; the fierce red glare Chequering the rifted darkness, fires the air, Each moment lost and kindled, while around. The mingling thunders swell the lengthen'd found. When piercing fudden through the dreadful roar The yelling shrieks of thousands strike the shore:

Presaging horror through the Monarch's breast Crept cold, and gloomy o'er the distant east, Through Gata's hills the whirling tempest a sight, And westward sweeping to the blacken'd tide, Howl'd o'er the trembling palace as it past, And o'er the gilded walls a gloomy twilight cast; Then, surious rushing to the darken'd bay, Resistless swept the black-wing'd night away, With all the clouds that hover'd o'er the fight, And o'er the weary combat pour'd the light.

As by an Alpine mountain's pathless side

Some traveller strays, unfriended of a guide;

If o'er the hills the sable night descend,

And gathering tempest with the darkness blend,

Deep from the cavern'd rocks beneath, aghast

He hears the howling of the whirlwind's blast;

Above, resounds the crass, and down the steep

Some rolling weight groans on with soundering sweep;

Aghast he stands amid the shades of night,

And all his soul implores the friendly light:

d Through Gata's bills—The hills of Gata or Gate, mountains which form a natural barrier on the eastern side of the kingdom of Malabar.

Nature's rude wall, against the sierce Canar They guard the sertile lawns of Malabar. LUSIAD, VII.

For the circumstances of the battle, and the tempest which then happened, see the life of Gama.

Dire shines the ray, the lightning's quivering blaze The yawning depth beneath his step betrays, But one half footstep faithful to the tread; Torn from the rock, the fragment o'er his head Nods crashing --- lost in horror at the sight, His knees no more support their fickly weight, Powerless he sinks, no more his heart-blood flows; So funk the Monarch, and his heart-blood froze; So funk he down, when o'er the clouded bay The rushing whirlwind pour'd the sudden day: Disaster's giant arm in one wide sweep Appear'd, and ruin blacken'd o'er the deep; The sheeted masts drove floating o'er the tide, And the torn hulks rowl'd tumbling on the fide; Some shatter'd plank each heaving billow tost, And by the hand of heaven dash'd on the coast Groan'd prores ingulph'd, the lashing surges rave O'er the black keels upturn'd, the swelling wave Kisses the lofty mast's reclining head; And far at fea some few torn galleys fled. Amid the dreadful scene triumphant rode The Lusian war-ships, and their aid bestow'd: Their speedy boats far round affisting ply'd, Where plunging, struggling, in the rolling tide, Grasping the shatter'd wrecks, the vanquish'd foes Rear'd o'er the dashing waves their haggard brows.

No word of fcorn the lofty GAMA spoke, Nor India's King the dreadful filence broke. Slow past the hour, when to the trembling shore In awful pomp the victor-navy bore: Terrific, nodding on, the bowsprits bend, And the red streamers other war portend: Soon bursts the roar; the bombs tremendous rise, And trail their blackening rainbows o'er the skies; O'er Calicut's proud domes their rage they pour, And wrap her temples in a sulphrous shower. 'Tis o'er __ In threatening silence rides the fleet: Wild rage and horror yell in every street; Ten thousands pouring round the palace gate, In clamorous uproar wail their wretched fate: While round the dome with lifted hands they kneel'd, Give justice, justice to the strangers yield ----Our friends, our husbands, sons, and fathers slain! Happier, alas, than these that yet remain —— Curst be the counsels, and the arts unjust ----Our friends in chains—our city in the dust— Yet, yet prevent—

The weight of horror and o'erpowering awe

f Ten thousands pouring round the palace gate,
In clamorous uproar———See the history in the life of Gama.

That shook the Moors, that shook the Regent's knees, And funk the Monarch down-By fwift degrees The popular clamour rifes. Lost, unmann'd, Around the King the trembling Council stand; While wildly glaring on each other's eyes Each lip in vain the trembling accent tries; With anguish sicken'd, and of strength bereft. Earnest each look enquires, What hope is left! In all the rage of shame and grief aghast, The Monarch, faultering, takes the word at last: By whom, great Chief, are these proud war-ships sway'd, Are there thy mandates honour'd and obey'd? Forgive, great Chief, let gifts of price restrain-Thy just revenge—Shall India's gifts be vain!— Oh spare my people and their doom'd abodes— Prayers, vows, and gifts appeale the injured gods: Shall man deny ---- Swift are the brave to spare: The weak, the innocent confess their care Helpless as innocent of guile to thee, Behold these thousands bend the suppliant knee Thy navy's thundering fides black to the land Display their terrors—yet mayst thou command——

O'erpower'd he paused: Majestic and serene Great VASCO rose, then pointing to the scene Where bled the war, Thy fleet, proud King, behold O'er ocean and the strand in carnage roll'd! So shall this palace smoking in the dust, And you proud city weep thy arts unjust. The Moors I knew, and for their fraud prepared, I left my fixt command my navy's guard: Whate'er from shore my name or seal convey'd Of other weight, that fixt command forbade; Thus, ere its birth destroy'd, prevented fell What fraud might dictate, or what force compel. This morn the facrifice of Fraud I stood, But hark, there lives the brother of my blood, And lives the friend, whose cares conjoin'd controul These floating towers, both brothers of my soul. If thrice, I said, arise the golden morn, Ere to my fleet you mark my glad return, Dark Fraud with all her Moorish arts withstands, And force or death withholds me from my bands: Thus judge, and fwift unfurl the homeward fail, Catch the first breathing of the eastern gale, Unmindful of my fate on India's h shore: Let but my Monarch know, I wish no more -Each, panting while I spoke, impatient cries, The tear-drop bursting in their manly eyes,

This most magnanimous resolution, to sacrifice his own safety or his life for the safe return of the sleet, is strictly true. See the life of Gama.

I left my fixt command my navy's guard:
See the life of Gama.

[&]quot; Unmindful of my fate on India's shore-

In all but one thy mandates we obey,
In one we yield not to thy generous fway:
Without thee never shall our fails return;
India shall bleed, and Calicut shall burn—
Thrice shall the morn arise; a slight of bombs
Shall then speak vengeance to their guilty domes:
Till noon we pause; then shall our thunders roar,
And desolation sweep the treacherous shore—
Behold, proud King, their signal in the sky,
Near his meridian tower the Sun rides high.
O'er Calicut no more the evening shade
Shall spread her peaceful wings, my wrath unstaid;
Dire through the night shall shriek the female scream.

Thy worth, great Chief, the pale-lipt Regent cries,
Thy worth we own; Oh, may these woes suffice!
To thee each proof of India's wealth we send;
Ambassadors, of noblest race, attend——
Slow as he faulter'd, GAMA catch'd the word,
On terms I talk not, and no truce afford:
Captives enough shall reach the Lusian shore:
Once you deceived me, and I treat no more.
Even now my faithful sailors, pale with rage,
Gnaw their blue lips, impatient to engage;

Ranged by their brazen tubes, the thundering band Watch the first movement of my brother's hand; E'en now, impatient, o'er the dreadful tire They wave their eager canes betipt with fire; Methinks my brother's anguish'd look I see, The panting nostril and the trembling knee, While keen he eyes the Sun: On hasty strides, Hurried along the deck, Coello chides His cold slow lingering, and impatient cries, Oh, give the sign, illume the sacrifice, A brother's vengeance for a brother's blood—

He spake; and stern the dreadful warrior stood;
So seem'd the terrors of his awful nod,
The Monarch trembled as before a God;
The treacherous Moors sunk down in faint dismay,
And speechless at his feet the Council lay:
Abrupt, with outstretch'd arms, the Monarch becries,
What yet — but dared not meet the Hero's eyes,
What yet may save!—Great VASCO stern rejoins,
Swift, undisputing, give th' appointed signs:
High o'er thy lostiest tower my slag display,
Me and my train swift to my sleet convey:

fary effect in the conduct of the poems. They hasten the catastrophe, and give a verisimilitude to the abrupt and full submiffion of the Zamorin.

h Abrupt—the Monarch cries—What yet may fave—Gama's declaration, that no message from him to the sleet could alter the orders he had already left, and his rejection of any farther treaty, have a neces-

Instant command—behold the Sun rides high—He spake, and rapture glow'd in every eye;
The Lusian standard o'er the palace slow'd,
Swift o'er the bay the royal barges row'd.
A dreary gloom a sudden whirlwind threw,
Amid the howling blast, enraged, withdrew
The vanquish'd Dæmon—Soon in lustre mild,
As April smiles, the Sun auspicious smiled:
Elate with joy, the shouting thousands trod,
And Gama to his fleet triumphant rode.

Soft came the eastern gale on balmy wings:

Each joyful sailor to his labour springs;

Some o'er the bars their breasts robust recline,

And with firm tugs the 'rollers from the brine,

Reluctant dragg'd, the slime-brown'd anchors raise;

Each gliding rope some nimble hand obeys;

Some bending o'er the yard-arm's length on high

With nimble hands the canvas wings untye,

The slapping sails their widening solds distend,

And measured ecchoing shouts their sweaty toils attend.

verification of this passage in the original affords a most noble example of imitative harmony:

The capstone is a cylindrical windlass, worked with bars, which are moved from hole to hole as it turns round. It is used to weigh the anchors, raise masts, &c. The name roller describes both the machine and its use, and it may be presumed, is a more poetical word than capstone. The Mas ja nas naos os bons trabalhadores Volvein o cabreítante, & repartidos Pello trabalho, huns puxao pella amarra, Outros quebrao co peito duro a barra.

Nor had the captives lost the Leader's care. Some to the shore the Indian barges bear; The noblest few the Chief detains to own His glorious deeds before the Lusian throne; To own the conquest of the Indian shore: Nor wanted every proof of India's store. What fruits in Ceylon's fragrant woods abound, With woods of cinnamon her hills are crown'd: Dry'd in its flower the nut of Banda's grove, The burning pepper and the fable clove; The clove, whose odour on the breathing gale Far to the fea Malucco's plains exhale; All these provided by the faithful Moor, All these, and India's gems, the navy bore: The Moor attends, Mozaide, whose zealous care To GAMA's eyes unveil'd each treachrous ' fnare: So burn'd his breast with heaven-illumined flame. And holy reverence of Messiah's name. Oh, favour'd African, by heaven's own light Call'd from the dreary shades of error's night; What man may dare his feeming ills arraign, Or what the grace of heaven's designs explain!

rior, the unexpected friend of Gama, bears a much more considerable part in the action of the Lusiad, than the faithful Achates, the friend of the hero, bears in the business of the Encid.

Mozaide, whose zealous care To Gama's eyes reveal'd each treachrous snare—Had this been mentioned sooner, the interest of the catastrophe of the poem must have languished. Though he is not a war-

Far didst thou from thy friends a stranger roam, There wast thou call'd to thy celestial k home.

Now swell'd on every side the steady sail;
The lofty masts reclining to the gale
On full spread wings the navy springs away,
And far behind them foams the Ocean grey:
Afar the lessening hills of Gata sly,
And mix their dim blue summits with the sky:
Beneath the wave low sinks the spicy shore,
And roaring through the tide each nodding prore
Points to the Cape, Great Nature's southmost bound,
The Cape of Tempests, now of Hope renown'd.
Their glorious tale on Lisboa's shore to tell
Inspires each bosom with a rapt'rous swell;
Now through their breasts the chilly tremors glide,
To dare once more the dangers dearly try'd——

There wast thou call'd to thy celestial home—This exclamatory address to the Moor Monzaida, however it may appear digressive, has a double propriety. The conversion of the Eastern world is the great purpose of the expedition of Gama, and Monzaida is the first fruits of that conversion. The good characters of the victorious heroes, however neglected by the great genius of Homer, have a fine effect in making an Epic Poem interest us and please. It might have been said, that Monzaida was a traitor to his friends, and who crowned his villany with apostacy. Camoens has therefore wisely drawn him with other features, worthy of the friendship of Gama. Had this been neglected, the hero of the Lusiad might have shared the fate of the wise Ulysses of the Iliad, against whom, as Voltaire justly observes, every reader bears a secret ill will. Nor is the poetical character of Monzaida unsupported by history. He was not an Arab Moor, so he did not desert his countrymen. By force these Moors had determined on the destruction of Gama: Monzaida admired and esteemed him, and therefore generously revealed to him his danger. By his attachment to Gama he lost all his effects in India, a circumstance which his prudence and knowledge of affairs must have certainly foreseen. By the known dangers he encountered, by the loss he thus voluntarily sustained, and by his after constancy, his sincerity is undoubtedly proved.

Soon to the winds are these cold sears resign'd,
And all their country rushes on the mind;
How sweet to view their native land, how sweet
The father, brother, and the bride to greet!
While listening round the hoary parent's board
The wondering kindred glow at every word,
How sweet to tell what woes, what toils they bore,
The tribes and wonders of each various shore!
These thoughts, the traveller's loved reward, employ,
And swell each bosom with unutter'd ioy.

The Queen of Love, by Heaven's eternal grace,
The guardian goddess of the Lusian race;
The Queen of Love, elate with joy, surveys
Her heroes, happy, plow the watry maze:
Their dreary toils revolving in her thought,
And all the woes by vengeful Bacchus wrought;

The joy of the flect on the homeward departure from India—We are now come to that part of the Lusiad, which, in the conduct of the poem, is parallel to the great catastrophe of the Iliad, when on the death of Hector, Achilles thus addresses the Grecian army,

— Ye fons of Greece, in triumph bring The corpse of Hector, and your Paans sing: Be this the song, slow moving tow'rd the shore, "Hector is dead, and Ilion is no more."

Our Portuguese Poet, who in his machinery, and many other instances, has followed the manner of Virgil, now forsakes him. In a very bold and masterly spirit he now models his poem by the steps of Homer. What of the Lusiad yet remains, in poetical conduct, though not in an imitation of circumstances, exactly resembles the latter part of the Iliad. The games at the funeral of Patroclus, and the redemption of the body of Hector, are the completion of the rage of Achilles. In the same manner, the reward of the heroes, and the consequences of their expedition, complete the unity of the Lusiad. I cannot say it appears that Milton ever read our Poet; (though Fanshaw's translation was published in his time) yet no instance can be given of a more striking resemblance of plan and conduct, than may be produced in two principal parts of the poem of Camoens, and of the Paradise Lost. Of this however hereafter in its proper place.

These toils, these woes, her yearning cares employ,
To bathe, to balsom in the streams of joy.

Amid the bosom of the watry waste,
Near where the bowers of Paradise were placed,
An isle, array'd in all the pride of slowers,
Of fruits, of fountains, and of fragrant bowers,
She means to offer to their homeward prows,
The place of glad repast and sweet repose;
And there before their raptured view to raise
The heaven-topt column of their deathless praise.

The Goddess now ascends her silver car;
Bright was its hue as Love's translucent star;
Beneath the reins the stately birds, that sing
Their sweet-toned death-song, spread the snowy wing;
The gentle winds beneath her chariot sigh,
And virgin blushes purple o'er the sky:
On milk white pinions borne, her cooing doves.
Form playful circles round her as she moves;
And now their beaks in fondling kisses join,
In amorous nods their fondling necks entwine.
O'er fair Idalia's bowers the goddess rode,
And by her alters sought Idalia's god:

Mear where the bowers of Paradise were placed—Between the mouths of the Ganges and Euphrates.

The youthful bowyer of the heart was there;
His falling kingdom claim'd his earnest " care.
His bands he musters, through the myrtle groves.
On buxom wings he trains the little Loves.
Against the world, rebellious and astray,
He means to lead them, and resume his sway:
For base-born passions, at his shrine 'twas told,
Each nobler transport of the breast controul'd.
A young Actwon, scornful of his ' lore,
Morn after morn pursues the foamy boar,

" His falling kingdom claim'd his earnest eare-This fiction, in poetical conduct, bears a striking resemblance to the digressive histories, with which Homer enriches and adorns his poems, particularly to the beau-tiful description of the seast of the Gods with the blameless Ethiopians. It also con-tains a masterly commentary on the machinery of the Lufiad. The Divine Love conducts Gama to India. The fame Divine Love is represented as preparing to reform the corrupted world, when its attention is particularly called to beflow a foretafte of immortality on the heroes of the expedition which discovered the Eastern World. Nor do the wild phantastic loves, mentioned in this little episode, afford any objection against this explanation, an explanation which is expressly given in the episode it-self. These wild phantastic amours signify, in the allegory, the wild fects of dif-ferent enthusialts, which spring up under the wings of the best and most rational institutions; and which, however contrary to each other, all agree in deriving their authority from the same source.

o A young Action—The French translator has the following characteristical note:
"This passage is an eternal monument of the freedoms taken by Camoens, and at the same time a proof of the imprudence of Poets; an authentic proof of that prejudice which sometimes blinds them, notwithstanding all the light of their genius.

The modern Actaon, of whom he fpeaks, was king Sebastian. He loved the chace; but that pleasure, which is one of the most innocent, and one of the most noble we can possibly taste, did not at all interrupt his attention to the affairs of state, and did not render him savage as our author pretends. On this point the Historians are rather to be believed. And what would the lot of princes be, were they allowed no relaxation from their toils, while they allow that privilege to their people? Subjects as we are, let us venerate the amusements of our Sovereigns; let us believe that the august cares for our good, which employ them, follow them often even to the very bosom of their pleasures."

Many are the strokes in the Lusiad which must endear the character of Camoens to every reader of sensibility. The noble freedom and manly indignation with which he mentions the soible of his prince, and the statement of the sensitive of the greatest names of Greece or Rome. While the shadow of freedom remained in Portugal, the greatest men of that nation, in the days of Lusian heroism, thought and conducted themselves in the spirit of Camoens. A noble ancedote of this brave spirit offers itself. Alonzo IV. surnamed the Brave, ascended the throne of Portugal in the vigour of his age The pleasures of the chace engrossed all his attention. His considents and savourites encouraged, and

In defart wilds devoted to the chace; Each dear enchantment of the female face Spurn'd and neglected: Him enraged he fees, And sweet, and dread his punishment decrees. Before his ravish'd fight, in sweet surprise, Naked in all her charms shall Dian rise; With love's fierce flames his frozen heart shall p burn, Coldly his fuit, the nymph, unmoved, shall spurn.

allured him to it. His time was spent in the forests of Cintra, while the affairs of government were neglected, or executed by those whose interest it was to keep their so-vereign in ignorance. His presence, at last, being necessary at Lisbon, he entered the council with all the brisk impetuosity of a young sportsman, and with great familiarity and gaiety entertained his nobles with the history of a whole month fpent in hunt-ing, in fishing, and shooting. When he had finished his narrative, a nobleman of the first rank rose up: Courts and camps, said he, were allotted for kings, not woods and deferts. Even the affairs of private men fuffer when recreation is preferred to business. But when the whims of pleasure engross the thoughts of a king, a whole nation is configned to ruin. We came here for other purposes than to hear the exploits of the chace, exploits which are only intelligible to grooms and falconers. If your majefly will attend to the wants, and remove the grievances of your people, you will find them obedient subjects; if not The king, flarting with rage, interrupted him, If not, what If not, refumed the nobleman, in a firm tone, they will look for another and a better king. Alonzo, in the highest transport of passion, expressed his resentment, and hasted out of the room. In a little while however he returned, calm and reconciled; I perceive, faid he, the truth of what yeu fay. He who will not execute the duties of a king, cannot long have good subjects. Remeniber, from this day, you have nothing more to do with Alonzo the sportsman, but with Alonzo the king of Portugal. His majesty was as good as his promise, and became as a warriour and politician, one of the greatest of the Portuguese monarchs.

P With love's fierce flames his frozen heart shall burn-" It is said, that upon the faith of a portrait Don Sebastian fell in love with Margaret of France, daughter of Henry II. and demanded her in marriage, but was refused. The Spaniards treated him no less unfavourably, for they also rejected his proposals for one of the daughters of Philip II. Our author considers these refusals as the punishment of Don Sebastian's excessive attachment to the chace; but this is only a consequence of the prejudice with which he viewed the amusements of his prince. The truth is, these princesses were refused for political reasons, and not with any regard to the manner in which he filled up his moments of leisure."

Thus Castera, who, with the same spirit of sagacity, starts and answers the following objections: "But here is a difficulty: Camoens wrote during the life of Don Scbastian, but the circumstance he relates (the return of Gama) happened feveral years before, under the reign of Emmanuel. How therefore could he fay that Cupid then faw Don Sebastian at the chace, when that prince was not then born? The answer is easy: Cupid, in the allegory of this work, represents the love of God, the Holy Spirit, who is God himself. Now the Divinity admits of no distinction of time; one glance of his eye beholds the past, the present, and the future; every thing is prefent before him."

Of these loved dogs that now his passions sway, Ah, may he never fall the hapless prey!

Enraged he sees a venal herd, the shame Of human race, assume the titled name; And each, for some base interest of his own, With Flattery's manna'd lips assail the throne. He sees the men, whom holiest sanctions bind To poverty, and love of human kind;

This defence of the fiction of Actaon, is not more absurd than useless. The free and bold spirit of poetry, and in particular the nature of allegory, defend it. The poet might easily have said, that Cupid foresaw; but had he said so his satire had been much less genteel. As the sentiments of Castera on this passage are extremely characteristical of the French ideas, another note from him will perhaps be agreeable. "Several Portuguese writers have remarked, says he, that the wish

Of these loved dogs that now his passions sway, Ah! may he never fall the hapless prey!

Had in it an air of prophecy; and Fate in effect, seemed careful to accomplish it, in making the presaged woes to fall upon Don Sebastian. If he did not fall a prey to his pack of hounds, we may however say that he was devoured by his favourites, who missed his youth and his great soul. But at any rate our poet has carried the similitude too far. It was certainly injurious to Don Sebastian, who nevertheless had the bounty not only not to punish this audacity, but to reward the just elogies which the author had bestowed on him in other places. As much as the indiscretion of Camoens ought to surprise us, as much ought we to admire the generosity of his master."

This foppery, this flavery in thinking, cannot fail to rouse the indignation of every manly breast, when the facts are fairly stated. Don Sebastian, who ascended the throne when a child, was a prince of great abilities and great spirit, but his youth was poisoned with the most romantic ideas of military glory. The affairs of state were left to his ministers, (for whose character see the next note) his other studies were neglected, and military exercises, of which he not unjustly esteemed the chace a principal, were almost his sole employ. Camoens beheld this romantic turn, and in a genteel allegorical fatire foreboded its consequences. The wish, that his prince might not fall the prey of his favourite paf-fion, was in vain. In a rash, ill-concerted expedition into Africa, Don Sebastian lost his crown in his twenty-sifth year, an event which foon after produced the fall of the Portuguese empire. Had the nobility posfessed the spirit of Camoens, had they, like him, endeavoured to check the Quix-otism of a young generous prince, that prince might have reigned long and happy, and Portugal might have escaped the Spa-nish yoke, which soon followed his descar at Alcazar; a yoke which funk Portugal into an abys of misery, from which, in all probability, she will never emerge in her former splendor.

Of human race, assume the titled name.—
"After having ridiculed all the pleasures of Don Sebastian, the author now proceeds to his courtiers, to whom he has done no injustice. Those who are acquainted with the Portuguese history, will readily acknowledge this." Castera.

While foft as drop the dews of balmy May,
Their words preach virtue and her charms display,
He sees with lust of gold their eyes on fire,
And every wish to lordly state aspire;
He sees them trim the lamp at night's mid hour,
To plan new laws to arm the regal power;
Sleepless at night's mid hour to raze the laws,
The sacred bulwarks of the peoples' cause,
Framed ere the blood of hard-earn'd victory
On their brave fathers' helm-hackt swords was dry.

Nor these alone, each rank, debased and rude,
Mean objects, worthless of their love, pursued:
Their passions thus rebellious to his lore,
The God decrees to punish and restore.
The little loves, light hovering in the air,
Twang their silk bow-strings, and their aims prepare:
Some on th' immortal anvils point the dart,
With power resistless to instance the heart;
Their arrow heads they tip with soft desires,
And all the warmth of love's celestial fires;
Some sprinkle o'er the shafts the tears of woe,
Some store the quiver, some relax the bow;
Each chanting as he works the tuneful strain
Of love's dear joys, of love's luxurious pain;

Charm'd

Charm'd was the lay to conquer and refine, Divine the melody, the fong divine.

Already now began the vengeful war,
The witness of the God's benignant care;
On the hard bosoms of the stubborn crowd
An arrowy shower the bowyer train bestow'd;
Pierced by the whizzing shafts deep sighs the air,
And answering sighs the wounds of love declare.
Though various featured and of various hue,
Each nymph seems loveliest in her lover's view;
Fired by the darts, by novice archers sped,
Ten thousand wild fantastic loves are bred:
In wildest dreams the rustic hind aspires,
And haughtiest lords confess the humblest fires.

The snowy swans of Love's celestial Queen
Now land her chariot on the shore of green;
One knee display'd she treads the slowery strand,
The gather'd robe falls loosely from her hand;
Half-seen her bosom heaves the living snow,
And on her smiles the living roses glow.

of this line, which the English language will not admit;

Nos duros coraçoens de plebe dura.

In the hard hearts of the hard vulgar.

The

The bowyer God whose subtle shafts ne'er fly Misaim'd, in vain, in vain on earth or sky, With rosy smiles the Mother Power receives: Around her climbing, thick as ivy leaves, The vassal Loves in fond contention join Who first and most shall kiss her hand divine. Swift in her arms she caught her wanton Boy, And, Oh, my fon, she cries, my pride, my joy, Against thy might the dreadful Typhon fail'd, Against thy shaft nor heaven, nor Jove prevail'd; Unless thine arrow wake the young desires, My strength, my power, in vain each charm expires : My fon, my hope, I claim thy powerful aid, Nor be the boon, thy mother fues, delay'd: Where-e'er, so will th' Eternal Fates, where-e'er The Lusian race the victor standards rear, There shall my hymns resound, my altars flame, And heavenly Love her joyful lore proclaim. My Lusian heroes, as my Romans, brave, Long tost, long hopeless on the storm-torn wave, Wearied and weak, at last on India's shore Arrived, new toils, repose denied, they bore; For Bacchus there with tenfold rage pursued My dauntless sons, but now his might subdued, Amid these raging seas, the scene of woes, Theirs shall be now the balm of sweet repose;

Theirs

Theirs every joy the noblest heroes claim, The raptured foretaste of immortal fame. Then bend thy bow and wound the Nereid train, The lovely daughters of the azure main; And lead them, while they pant with amorous fire, Right to the isle which all my smiles inspire: Soon shall my care that beauteous isle supply, Where Zephyr breathing love, on Flora's lap shall sigh. There let the nymphs the gallant heroes meet, And strew the pink and rose beneath their feet: In chrystal halls the feast divine prolong, With wine nectareous and immortal fong: Let every nymph the fnow white bed prepare, And, fairer far, resign her bosom there; There to the greedy riotous embrace Resign each hidden charm with dearest grace. Thus from my native waves a hero line Shall rife, and o'er the East illustrious 'shine; Thus shall the rebel world thy prowess know, And what the boundless joys our friendly powers bestow.

She faid; and smiling view'd her mighty Boy; Swift to the chariot springs the god of joy;

Thus from my native waves a hero line Shall rife, and o'er the East illustrious shine— By the line of heroes to be produced by the union of the Portuguese with the Nereids, is to be understood the other Portuguese, who, following the steps of Gama, established illustrious colonies in India."—

Castera.

His ivory bow, and arrows tipt with gold, Blaz'd to the fun-beam as the chariot roll'd: Their filver harness shining to the day The fwans on milk-white pinions spring away, Smooth gliding o'er the clouds of lovely blue; And Fame, ' fo will'd the God, before them flew: A giant goddess, whose ungovern'd tongue With equal zeal proclaims or right or wrong; Oft had her lips the god of love blasphem'd, And oft with tenfold praise his conquests nam'd: An hundred eyes she rolls with ceaseless care, A thousand tongues what these behold declare: Fleet is her flight, the lightning's wing she rides, And though the thifts her colours swift as glides The April rainbow, still the croud she guides. And now aloft her wondering voice she rais'd, And with a thousand glowing tongues she prais'd The bold Discoverers of the eastern world -In gentle swells the listening surges curl'd, And murmur'd to the founds of plaintive love Along the grottoes where the Nereids rove. The drowfy Power on whose smooth easy mein The smiles of wonder and delight are seen, imitations, copies after Homer. He adopts fome circumstances, but by adding others, he makes a new picture, which justly may be called his own.

Whofe

t And Fame—a giant-goddess—This passage affords a striking instance of the judgment of Camoens. Virgil's celebrated description of Fame, (see p. 206.) is in his eye, but he copies it, as Virgil, in his best

Whose glossy simpering eye bespeaks her name, Credulity, attends the goddess Fame. Fired by the heroes' praise, the watery gods, With ardent speed forsake their deep abodes; Their rage by vengeful Bacchus rais'd of late, Now stung remorfe, and love succeeds to hate. Ah, where remorfe in female bosom bleeds, The tenderest love in all its glow succeeds. When fancy glows, how strong, O Love, thy power! Nor slipt the eager God the happy hour; Swift fly his arrows o'er the billowy main, Wing'd with his fires, nor flies a shaft in vain: Thus, ere the face the lover's breast inspires, The voice of fame awakes the foft defires. While from the bow-string start the shafts divine, His ivory moon's wide horns incessant join, Swift twinkling to the view; and wide he pours Omnipotent in love his arrowy showers. E'en Thetis' self confest the tender smart, And pour'd the murmurs of the wounded heart:

[&]quot; The quatery gods—To mention the gods in the masculine gender, and immediately to apply to them,

O peito feminil, que levemente Muda quaysquer propositos tomados.—

The ease with which the semale breast changes its resolutions, may to the hypercritic appear reprehensible. The expression however is classical, and therefore retained. Virgil uses it, where Eneas is conducted by Venus through the slames of Troy;

Descendo, ac ducente Deo, flammam inter et hostes

Expedior

This is in the manner of the Greek Poets, who use the word Θ_{i} for God or Goddess.

Soft o'er the billows pants the amourous figh; With wishful langour melting on each eye The love-sick nymphs explore the tardy sails That wast the heroes on the lingering gales.

Give way, ye lofty billows, low subside, Smooth as the level plain, your fwelling pride, Lo, Venus comes! Oh, foft, ye surges, sleep, Smooth be the bosom of the azure deep, Lo, Venus comes! and in her vigorous train She brings the healing balm of love-fick pain. White as her fwans", and stately as they rear Their fnowy crests when o'er the lake they steer, Slow moving on, behold, the fleet appears, And o'er the distant billow onward steers. The beauteous Nereids flush'd in all their charms Surround the Goddess of the soft alarms: Right to the isle she leads the smiling train, And all her arts her balmy lips explain; The fearful langour of the asking eye, The lovely blush of yielding modesty, The grieving look, the figh, the favouring fmile. And all th' endearments of the open wile, w White as her fwans—A diffant fleet compared to fwans on a lake is certainly an happy thought. The allusion to the pomp of Venus, whose agency is immediately concerned, gives it besides a peculiar propriety. This simile however is not in the original. It is adopted from an uncommon liberty taken by Fanshaw;

The pregnant fayles on Neptune's surface creep, Like her own Swans, in gate, out-chest, and fether.

She taught the nymphs——in willing breasts that heaved To hear her lore, her lore the nymphs received.

As now triumphant to their native shore Through the wide deep the joyful navy bore, Earnest the pilot's eyes sought cape or bay, For long was yet the various watery way; Sought cape or isle from whence their boats might bring The healthful bounty of the chrystal spring: When fudden, all in nature's pride array'd, The Isle of Love its glowing breast display'd. O'er the green bosom of the dewy lawn Soft blazing flow'd the filver of the dawn, The gentle waves the glowing lustre share, Arabia's balm was sprinkled o'er the air. Before the fleet, to catch the heroes' view, The floating isle fair Acidalia drew: Soon as the floating verdure caught their * fight, She fixt, unmov'd, the island of delight. So when in child-birth of her Jove-sprung load, The fylvan goddess and the bowyer god,

Venus. "The fictions of Camoens, fays he, font d'autant plus merveilleuses, qu'elles ont toutes leur fondement dans l'bistoire, are the more marvellous, because they are all founded in history. It is not difficult to find why he makes his island of Anchediva to wander on the waves; it is in allusion to a singular event related by Barros." He then proceeds to the story of Timoja, as if the genius of Camoens stood in need of so weak an assistance.

^{*} Soon at the floating werdure caught their fight—As the departure of Gama from India was abrupt (fee his life) he put into one of the beautiful islands of Anchediva for fresh water. While he was here careening his ships, says Faria, a pirate named Timoja, attacked him with eight small vessels, so linked together and covered with boughs, that they formed the appearance of a floating island. This, says Castera, afforded the siction of the floating island of

In friendly pity of Latona's woes, Amid the waves the Delian isle arose. And now led fmoothly o'er the furrow'd tide, Right to the isle of joy the vessels glide: The bay they enter, where on every hand, Around them clasps the flower-enamell'd land; A safe retreat, where not a blast may shake Its fluttering pinions o'er the stilly lake. With purple shells, transfus'd as marble veins, The yellow fands celestial Venus stains. With graceful pride three hills of softest green Rear their fair bosoms o'er the sylvan scene; Their sides embroider'd boast the rich array Of flowery shrubs in all the pride of May; The purple lotos and the snowy thorn, And yellow pod-flowers every flope adorn. From the green summits of the leafy hills Descend with murmuring lapse three limpid rills; Beneath the rose-trees loitering slow they glide, Now tumbles o'er some rock their chrystal pride; Sonorous now they roll adown the glade, Now plaintive tinkle in the fecret shade, Now from the darkling grove, beneath the beam Of ruddy morn, like melted filver stream,

In friendly pity of Latena's ruces— Latona, in pregnancy by Jupiter, was perfecuted by Juno, who fent the ferpent Python in pursuit of her. Neptune, in pity of her distress, raised the island of Delos for her refuge, where she was delivered of Apollo and Diana.——Ovid. Met.

Edging the painted margins of the bowers, And breathing liquid freshness on the slowers. Where bright reflected in the pool below The vermil apples tremble on the bough; Where o'er the yellow fands the waters fleep The primrosed banks, inverted, dew drops weep; Where murmuring o'er the pebbles purls the stream The filver trouts in playful curvings gleam. Long thus and various every riv'let strays, Till closing now their long meandring maze, Where in a fmiling vale the mountains end, Form'd in a chrystal lake the waters blend :: Fring'd was the border with a woodland shade, In every leaf of various green array'd, Each yellow-ting'd, each mingling tint between The dark ash-verdure and the silvery green. The trees now bending forward flowly shake Their lofty honours o'er the chrystal lake; Now from the flood the graceful boughs retire With cov referve, and now again admire Their various liveries by the fummer drest, Smooth-gloss'd and softened in the mirror's breast.

In 1505 Don Francisco Almeyda built a fort in this island. In digging among some ancient ruins he found many crucifixes of black and red colour, from whence the Portuguese conjectured, says Osorius, that the Anchedivian islands had in sormer ages been inhabited by Christians. Vid. Osor. L. iv.

² Form'd in a chrystal lake the waters blend.— Castera also attributes this to history. "The Portuguese actually found in this island, says he, a fine piece of water ornamented with hewn stones and magnificent aqueducts; an ancient and superb work, of which no body knew the author."

So by her glass the wishful virgin stays, And oft retiring steals the lingering gaze. A thousand boughs aloft to heaven display Their fragrant apples shining to the day; The orange here perfumes the buxom air, And boasts the golden hue of Daphne's hair. Near to the ground each spreading bough descends, Beneath her yellow load the citron bends; The fragrant lemon scents the cooly grove; Fair as when ripening for the days of love The virgin's breafts the gentle swell avow. So the twin fruitage swell on every bough. Wild forest trees the mountain sides array'd With curling foliage and romantic shade: Here spreads the poplar, to Alcides dear; And dear to Phæbus, ever verdant here,

The orange here perfumes the buxom air, And boasts the golden hue of Daphne's hair.— Frequent allusions to the sables of the antients form a characteristical seature of the poetry of the 16th and 17th centuries. A prosusion of it is pedantry; a moderate use of it however in a poem of these times pleases, because it discovers the stages of composition, and has in itself a sine effect, as it illustrates its subject by presenting the classical reader with some little landscapes of that country through which he has travelled. The description of forests is a favourite topic in poetry. Chaucer, Tasso, and Spenser, have been happy in it, but both have copied an admired passage in Statius;

Cadit ardua fagus,
Chaoniumque nemus, brumæque illæfa cupreffus;
Procumbunt piceæ, flammis alimenta fupremis,

Ornique, iliceæque trabes, metuandaque sulco Taxus, & infandos belli potura cruores Fraxinus, atque situ non expugnabile robur: Hinc andax abies, & odoro vulnere pinus Scinditur, acclinant intonsa cacumina terræ Alnus amica fretis, nec inhospita vitibus ulmus.

In rural descriptions three things are necesfary to render them poetical; the happiness of epithet, of picturesque arrangement, and of little landscape views. Without these, all the names of trees and flowers, though strung together in tolerable numbers, contain no more poetry than a nurseryman or a florist's catalogue. In Statius, in Tasso and Spenser's admired forests, (Gier. Liber. C. 3. St. 75, 76, and F. Queen, B. 1. C. 1. St. 8, 9.) the poetry consists entirely in the happiness of the epithets. In Camoens, all the three requisites are admirably attained, and blended together. The laurel joins the bowers for ever green, The myrtle bowers belov'd of beauty's queen. To Jove the oak his wide spread branches rears; And high to heaven the fragrant cedar bears; Where through the glades appear the cavern'd rocks, The lofty pine-tree waves her fable locks; Sacred to Cybele the whifpering pine Loves the wild grottoes where the white cliffs shine; Here towers the cypress, preacher to the wife, Less'ning from earth her spiral honours rise, Till, as a spear-point rear'd, the topmost spray Points to the Eden of eternal day. Here round her fostering elm the smiling vine In fond embraces gives her arms to twine, The numerous clusters pendant from the boughs, The green here glistens, here the purple glows; For here the genial feafons of the year Danc'd hand in hand, no place for winter here; His grifly visage from the shore expell'd, United fway the smiling seasons held. Around the fwelling fruits of deepening red, Their fnowy hues the fragrant bloffoms spread; Between the bursting buds of lucid green The apple's ripe vermillion blush is seen; For here each gift Pomona's hand bestows In cultur'd garden, free, uncultur'd flows,

The flavour sweeter, and the hue more fair, Than e'er was foster'd by the hand of care. The cherry here in shining crimson glows; And stain'd with lover's blood b, in pendant rows, The bending boughs the mulberries o'erload; The bending boughs carefs'd by Zephyr nod. The generous peach, that strengthens in exile Far from his native earth, the Persian soil. The velvet peach of fofest glossy blue Hangs by the pomgranate of orange hue, Whose open heart a brighter red displays. Than that which sparkles in the ruby's blaze. Here, trembling with their weight, the branches bear, Delicious as profuse, the tapering pear. For thee, fair fruit, the fongsters of the grove-With hungry bills from bower to arbour rove. Ah, if ambitious thou wilt own the care To grace the feast of heroes and the fair, Soft let the leaves with grateful umbrage hide The green-ting'd orange of thy mellow fide. A thousand flowers of gold, of white and red Far o'er the shadowy 'vale their carpets spread, Signa tene cædis: pullosque et lustibus aptos Semper habe foctus gemini monumenta cruoris. Ovid. Met.

b And stain'd with Lower's blood, --- Py-ramus and Thisbe:

Arborei fœtus aspergine cædis in atram Vertuntur saciem: madesactaque sauguine radix Puniceo tingit pendentia mora colore.... At tu quo ramis arbor miserabile corpus Nunc tegis unius, mox es tectura duorum;

The shadowy vale — Literal from the original, — O sombrio valle, — which Fanshaw however has translated, "the gloomy

Of fairer tapestry, and of richer bloom,
Than ever glow'd in Persia's boasted loom:
As glittering rainbows o'er the verdure thrown,
O'er every woodland walk th' embroidery shone.
Here o'er the watery mirror's lucid bed
Narcissus, self-enamour'd, hangs the head;
And here, bedew'd with love's celestial tears,
The woe-markt flower of slain Adonis drears
Its purple head, prophetic of the reign,
When lost Adonis shall revive again.
At strife appear the lawns and purpled skies,
Which from each other stole the beauteous dyes:

gloomy valley," and thus has given us a functeal, where the author intended a feftive landscape. It must be confessed however, that the description of the island of Venus, is infinitely the best part all of Fanshaw's translation. And indeed the dullest prose translation might obscure, but could not possibly throw a total eclipse over so admirable an original.

The woe-markt flower of flain Adonis—water'd by the tears of love.—The Aenemone. "This, fays Castera, is applicable to the celestial Venus, for according to mythology, her amour with Adonis had nothing in it impure, but was only the love which nature bears to the sun." The fables of antiquity have generally a threefold interpretation, an historical allusion, a physical and a metaphysical allegory. In the latter view, the fable of Adonis is only applicable to the celestial Venus. A divine youth is outrage-ously slain, but shall revive again at the restoration of the golden age. Several nations, it is well known, under different names, celebrated the mysteries, or the death and resurrection of Adonis; among whom were the British Druids, as we are told by Dr. Stukely. In the same manner Cupid, in the sable of Phyche, is interpreted by mythologists, to signify the divine love weeping over the degeneracy of human nature.

At strife appear the lawns and purpled skies, who from each other stole the beauteous dyes.—On this passage Castera has the following sensible though turgid note: "This thought, says he, is taken from the idylium of Ausonius on the rose;

"Ambigeres rapereme rosis Aurora ruborem, An daret, & stores tingere torta dies.

"Camoens who had a genius rich of itself,
"fill farther enriched it at the expence of the ancients. Behold what makes great authors! Those who pretend to give us nothing but the fruits of their own growth, soon fail, like the little rivulets which dry up in the summer, very different from the floods, who receive in their course the tribute of an hundred and an hundred rivers, and which even in the dog-days carry their waves triumphant to the ocean."

The lawn in all Aurora's lustre glows, Aurora steals the blushes of the rose, The rose displays the blushes that adorn The spotless virgin on the nuptial morn. Zephyr and Flora emulous conspire To breathe their graces o'er the field's attire; The one gives healthful freshness, one the hue, Fairer than e'er creative pencil drew. Pale as the love-fick hopeless maid they dye The modest violet; from the curious eye The modest violet turns her gentle head, And by the thorn weeps o'er her lowly bed. Bending beneath the tears of pearly dawn The fnow white lilly glitters o'er the lawn; Low from the bough reclines the damask rose, And o'er the lilly's milk white bosom glows. Fresh in the dew far o'er the painted dales, Each fragrant herb her sweetest scent exhales. The hyacinth bewrays the doleful Ai', And calls the tribute of Apollo's figh; Still on it's bloom the mournful flower retains The lovely blue that dy'd the stripling's veins.

Hyacinthus, a youth beloved of Apollo, by whom he was accidentally slain, and afterwards turned into a flower:

Tyrioque nitentior oftro

Purpureus color huic, argenteus effet in illis. Non fatis hoc Phæbo eft: is enim fuit auctor honoris.

Ipse suos gemitus soliis inscribit; & Ai, Ai, Flos habet inscriptum: sunestaque littera ducta est.

OVID. MET.

Pomona fir'd with rival envy views The glaring pride of Flora's darling hues; Where Flora bids the purple iris spread, She hangs the wilding's bloffom white and red; Where wild thyme purples, where the daify fnows The curving flopes, the melon's pride she throws; Where by the stream the lilly of the vale, Primrose, and cowslip meek, perfume the gale, Beneath the lilly and the cowslip's bell The scarlet strawberries luxurious swell. Nor these alone the teeming Eden yields, Each harmless bestial crops the flowery fields; And birds of every note and every wing Their loves responsive thro' the branches sing: In fweet vibrations thrilling o'er the skies, High pois'd in air the lark his warbling tries; The fwan flow failing o'er the chrystal lake Tunes his melodious note; from every brake The glowing strain the nightingale returns, And in the bowers of love the turtle mourns. Pleas'd to behold his branching horns appear, O'er the bright fountain bends the fearless deer; The hare starts trembling from the bushy shade, And swiftly circling, crosses oft the glade. Where from the rocks the bubbling founts distil, The milk-white lambs come bleating down the hill; The dappled heifer feeks the vales below,
And from the thicket springs the bounding doe.
To his lov'd nest, on fondly fluttering wings,
In chirping bill the little songster brings
The food untasted; transport thrills his breast;
'Tis nature's touch, 'tis instinct's heav'n-like feast.
Thus bower and lawn were deckt with Eden's flowers,
And song and joy imparadised the bowers.

And foon the fleet their ready anchors threw:
Lifted on eager tip-toe at the view,
On nimble feet that bounded to the strand
The second Argonauts selance to land.
Wide o'er the beauteous isle the lovely Fair
Stray through the distant glades, devoid of care.

The fecond Argonauts.—The expedition of the Golden Eleece was esteemed in ancient poetry, one of the most daring adventures, the success of which was accounted miraculous. The allusions of Camoens to this voyage, though in the spirit of his age, are by no means improper.

h Wide o'er the beauteous ifle the lovely Fair.

We now come to the paffage condemned by Voltaire as so lascivious, that no nation in Europe, except the Portuguese and Italians could bear it. But the author of the detestable poem La Pucelle d'Orleans, talks of the island of Venus with that same knowledge of his subject with which he made Camoens, who was not then born, a companion to Gama in the expedition which discovered the route to India. Though Voltaire's cavils, I trust, are in general fully answered in the preface, a particular examination of the charge of indecency may not be unnecessary ere the reader enter upon the passage itself. No painter then, let it be remembered, was ever blamed for drawing the graces unveiled or naked. In sculpture, in painting, and poetry, it is not nakedness, it is the expression or manner only that offends decency. It is this which constitutes the difference between a Venus de Medicis and the lascivious paintings in the apartments of a Tiberius. The fate of Camoens has hitherto been very peculiar. The mixture of Pagan and Christian mythology in his machinery has been anathematifed, and his island of Love represented as a brothel. Yet both accusations are the arrogant affertions of the most superficial acquaintance with his works, a Hearfay, exchoed from critic to critic. His poem itself, and a comparison of its parts with the similar conduct of the greatest modern poets, will clearly evince, that in both instances no modern Epic Writer of note has given less offence to true criticism.

Not to mention Ariosto, whose descriptions will often admit of no paliation, Tasso, Spenser,

From lowly valley and from mountain grove The lovely nymphs renew the strains of love.

Spenfer, and Milton, have always been efteemed among the challest of poets, yet in that delicacy of warm description, which Milton has so finely exemplified in the nuptials of our first parents, none of them can boast the continued uniformity of the Portuguese Poet. Though there is a warmth in the colouring of Camoens which even the genius of Tasso has not reached; and though the island of Armida is evidently copied from the Lufiad, yet those who are possessed of the finer feelings, will eafily discover an essential difference between the love-scenes of the two poets, a difference greatly in favour of the delicacy of the former. Though the nymphs in Camoens are detected naked in the woods and in the stream, and though desirous to captivate, still their behaviour is that of the virgin who hopes to be the spouse. They act the part of offended modesty; even when they yield they are filent, and behave in every respect like Milton's Eve in the state of innocence, who

What was honour knew

And who displayed

Her virtue, and the conscience of her worth, That would be wooed, and not unfought be won.

To fum up all, the nuptial fanctity draws its hallowed curtains, and a masterly allegory shuts up the love-scenes of Camoens.

How different from all this is the island of Armida in Tasso, and its translation, the bower of Acrasia, in Spenser! In these virtue is feduced; the scene therefore is less delicate. The nymphs, while they are bathing, in place of the modelty of the bride as in Camoens, employ all the arts of the lascivious wanton. They stay not to be woodd; but, as Spenfer gives it,

The amorous faveet spoils to greedy eyes reveal.

One stanza from our English poet, which however is rather fuller than the original, shall here suffice:

Withal the laughed and the bluth'd withal, That bluthing to her laughter gave more grace, And laughter to her blufhing, as did fall. Now when they spy'd the knight to slack his pace, Them to hehold, and in his sparkling face The secret signs of kindled lust appear, Their wanton merriments they did encrease,

And to him becken'd to approach more near, And sheav'd him many sights, that courage cold could rear.

This and other descriptions,

Upon a bed of rofes she was laid As faint through heat, or dight to pleafant fin-present every idea of lascivious voluptuoulnels. The allurements of speech are also added. Songs, which breathe every perfuafive, are heard; and the nymphs boldly call to the beholder;

E' dolce campo di battaglia il letto Fiavi, e l'berbetta morbida de prati-TASSO. Our field of battle is the downy bed,

Or flowery turf amid the finiling mead .lioolE.

These, and the whole scenes in the domains of Armida and Acrasia, are in a turn of marmer the reverse of the island of Venus. In these the expression and idea are meretricious. In Camoens, though the colouring is even warmer, yet the modesty of the Venus de Medicis is still preserved. In every thing he describes there is still something strongly similar to the modest attitude of the arms of that celebrated statue. Though prudery, that usual mask of the impurest minds, may condemn him, yet those of the most chaste, though less gloomy turn, will allow, that in comparison with others, he might say, -Virginibus puerisque canto.

Spenfer also, where he does not follow Tasio, is often gross; and even in some instances, where the expression is most delicate, the picture is nevertheless indecently lascivious. The third and sourth of the five concluding stanzas, which in his second edition he added to the third book of the Faerie Queene, afford a striking example. The virgin Britomart, the pattern of chastity, stands by,

while Sir Scudamore and Amoret,

- With sweet countervaile Each other of love's bitter fruit despoile-

But this shall not here be cited; only,

That Britomart, half envying their blefs, " Was much empassion'd in her gentle sprite, And to herself oft wish'd like happiness; In vain she wish'd, that fate n'ould let her yet possels.

Eee

Nor

Here from the bowers that crown the plaintive rill
The folemn harp's melodious warblings thrill;
Here from the shadows of the upland grott
The mellow lute renews the swelling note.
As fair Diana and her virgin train
Some gayly ramble o'er the flowery plain,

Nor is Spenser's wife of Malbecco more indelicate than some lines of the Paradise Lost. The reply of the Angel to Adam's description of his nuptials, contains some strokes intolerably disgussul. And the first effect of the forbidden fruit offers a remarkable contrast to that delicacy of expression which adorns the first loves of Adam and Eve. If there is propriety however in thus representing the amours of guilty intoxication, by which figure Milton calls it, some of the terms of expression are still indesensibly indelicate.

Nor may Thomson, the man

One line which, dying, he would wish to blotplead a greater delicacy of description than Camoens. Indeed one can scarcely call the adventure of Damon, when he sees his mistress strip and bathe, so handsomely managed as the similar scenes in the island of Venus:

How durft thou rifque the foul diffracting view-

And,

Such madning draughts of beauty to the foul,
As for a white o'erwhelm'd his raptur'd thought
With luxury too daring—

not only feem to want fome of that dignity which lifts description above the ludicrous, but feem also to have a je ne syai quoi of perturbation not quite delicate. The heroes of the Lusiad indeed do not kiss the trees or write billets donx when they see the nymphs naked before them. But though Thomson with great propriety has made his lovers fly from each other, in modest awe, after having left the means of discovery,

Traced by his ready pencil, on the bank With trembling hand he threw

Which she fnatched up, and answered on the spreading beech,

Of rural lovers this confession carv'd, Which soon her Damon kis'd with weeping

joy be still as now
Discreet; the time may come you need not fly.

Yet this difference of conduct in the two poets, affords no objection against either. In each circumstance propriety is preserved. In a word, so unjust is the censure of Voltaire, a censure which never arose from a comparison of Camoens with other poets, fo ill grounded is the charge against him, that we cannot but admire his superior delicacy; a delicacy not even understood in England in his age, when the groffest imagery often found a place in the pulpits of the most pious divines; when in the old li-turgy itself it was esteemed no indelicacy of expression to enjoin the wife to be buxom in bed and at board We know what liberties were taken by the politest writers of the Augustan age; and such is the change of manners, that Shakespeare and Spenser might with justice appeal from the judgment of the present, when it condemns them for indecency. Camoens, however, may appeal to the most polished age; let him be heard for himself, let him be compared with others of the first name, and his warmest descriptions need not dread the decision.

In feign'd pursuit of hare or bounding roe, Their graceful mein and beauteous limbs to shew; Now feeming careless, fearful now and coy, So taught the goddess of unutter'd joy, And gliding through the distant glades display Each limb, each movement, naked as the day. Some light with glee in careless freedom take Their playful revels in the chrystal lake; One trembling stands no deeper than the knee To plunge reluctant, while in sportful glee Another o'er her sudden laves the tide; In pearly drops the wishful waters glide, Reluctant dropping from her breasts of snow; Beneath the wave another feems to glow; The amorous waves her bosom fondly kis'd, And rose and fell, as panting, on her breast. Another fwims along with graceful pride, Her filver arms the glistening waves divide, Her shining sides the fondling waters lave, Her glowing cheeks are brighten'd by the wave, Her hair, of mildest yellow, flows from side To fide, as o'er it plays the wanton tide, And careless as she turns, her thighs of snow Their tapering rounds in deeper lustre shew.

Where fome bold Lusians fought the woodland prey, And thro' the thickets forc'd the pathless way; Where some in shades impervious to the beam, Supinely listen'd to the murmuring stream: Bright sudden through the boughs the various dyes Of pink, of scarlet, and of azure rife. Swift from the verdant banks the loiterers spring, Down drops the arrow from the half drawn string: Soon they behold 'twas not the rose's hue, The jonquil's yellow, nor the pansie's blue: Dazzling the shades the nymphs appear—the zone And flowing scarf in gold and azure shone. Naked as Venus stood in Ida's bower, Some trust the dazzling charms of native power; Through the green boughs and darkling shades they shew The shining lustre of their native snow, And every tapering, every rounded fwell Of thigh, of bosom, as they glide, reveal. As visions cloath'd in dazzling white they rife, Then steal unnoted from the flurried eyes: Again apparent, and again withdrawn, They shine and wanton o'er the smiling lawn. Amazed and lost in rapture of surprize, All joy, my friends, the brave Veloso cries, Whate'er of goddesses old fable told, Or poet sung of sacred groves, behold.

Sacred

Sacred to goddesses divinely bright These beauteous forests own their guardian might. From eyes profane, from every age conceal'd, To us, behold, all Paradise reveal'd! Swift let us try if phantoms of the air, Or living charms appear, divinely fair! Swift at the word the gallant Lufians bound, Their rapid footsteps scarcely touch the ground; Through copfe, through brake, impatient of their prey, Swift as the wounded deer they spring away: Fleet through the winding shades in rapid slight The nymphs as wing'd with terror fly their fight; Fleet though they fled the mild reverted eye, And dimpling fmile their feeming fear deny. Fleet through the shades in parted rout they glide: If winding path the chosen pairs divide, Another path by fweet mistake betrays, And throws the lover on the lover's gaze: If dark-brow'd bower conceal the lovely fair, The laugh, the shriek, confess the charmer there.

Luxurious here the wanton zephyrs toy,
And every fondling favouring art employ.
Fleet as the Fair Ones speed, the busy gale
In wanton frolic lifts the trembling veil;

White though the veil, in fairer brighter glow,
The lifted robe displays the living snow:
Quick fluttering on the gale the robe conceals,
Then instant to the glance each charm reveals;
Reveals, and covers from the eyes on fire,
Reveals, and with the shade instances desire.
One as her breathless lover hastens on,
With wily stumble sudden lies o'erthrown;
Confus'd, she rises with a blushing smile;
The lover falls the captive of her guile:
Tript by the Fair he tumbles on the mead,
The joyful victim of his eager speed.

Afar, where sport the wantons in the lake,
Another band of gallant youths betake;
The laugh, the shriek, the revel and the toy,
Bespeak the innocence of youthful joy.
The laugh, the shriek, the gallant Lusians hear
As through the forest glades they chace the deer;
For arm'd to chace the bounding roe they came,
Unhop'd the transport of a nobler game.
The naked wantons, as the youths appear,
Shrill through the woods resound the shriek of sear.
Some seign such terror of the forced embrace,
Their virgin modesty to this gives place,

Naked they spring to land and speed away To deepest shades unpierc'd by glaring day; Thus yielding freely to the amorous eyes What to the amorous hands their fear denies. Some well assume Diana's virgin shame, When on her naked sports the hunter 'came Unwelcome—plunging in the chrystal tide, In vain they strive their beauteous limbs to hide; The lucid waves, 'twas all they could, bestow A milder luftre and a fofter glow. As lost in earnest care of future need, Some to the banks to fnatch their mantles speed, Of present view regardless; every wile Was yet, and every net of amorous guile. Whate'er the terror of the feign'd alarm, Display'd, in various force, was every charm. Nor idle stood the gallant youth; the wing Of rapture lifts them, to the Fair they spring; Some to the copie pursue their lovely prey; Some cloath'd and shod, impatient of delay, Impatient of the stings of fierce desire, Plunge headlong in the tide to quench their fire. So when the fowler to his cheek uprears The hollow steel, and on the mallard bears, His eager dog, ere bursts the flashing roar, Fierce for the prey springs headlong from the shore, 1 The bunter. - Acteon.

And barking cuts the wave with furious joy:
So mid the billow springs each eager boy,
Springs to the nymph whose eyes from all the rest
By singling him her secret wish confest.

A fon of Mars was there, of generous race, His every elegance of manly grace; Amorous and brave; the bloom of April youth Glow'd on his cheek, his eye spoke simplest truth; Yet love, capricious to th' accomplish'd boy, Had ever turn'd to gall each promis'd joy, Had ever spurn'd his vows; yet still his heart Would hope, and nourish still the tender smart: The purest delicacy fann'd his fires, And proudest honour nurs'd his fond desires. Not on the first that fair before him glow'd, Not on the first the youth his love bestow'd. In all her charms the fair Ephyre came, And Leonardo's heart was all on flame. Affection's melting transport o'er him stole, And Love's all generous glow intranced his foul; Of felfish joy unconscious, every thought On fweet delirium's ocean streamed affoat, Pattern of beauty did Ephyre shine, Nor less she wish'd these beauties to resign:

More than her fisters long'd her heart to yield, Yet swifter fled she o'er the smiling field. The youth now panting with the hopeless chace, Oh turn, he cries, Oh turn thy angel face: False to themselves can charm's like these conceal The hateful rigour of relentless steel; And did the stream deceive me when I stood Amid my peers reflected in the flood? The easiest port and fairest bloom I bore— False was the stream—while I in vain deplore, My peers are happy; lo, in every shade, In every bower, their love with love repaid! I, I alone through brakes, through thorns pursue A cruel Fair—Ah, still my fate proves true, True to its rigour—who, fair nymph, to thee Reveal'd, 'twas I that fued! unhappy me! Born to be spurn'd though honesty inspire— Alas, I faint, my languid finews tire; Oh stay thee powerless to sustain their weight My knees fink down, I fink beneath my fate! He spoke; a rustling urges thro' the trees, Instant new vigour strings his active knees, Wildly he glares around, and raging cries, And must another snatch my lovely prize! In favage grasp thy beauteous limbs constrain! I feel, I madden while I feel the pain!

Oh lost, thou sly'st the safety of my arms, My hand shall guard thee, softly seize thy charms, No brutal rage inflames me, yet I burn! Die shall thy ravisher—Oh goddess, turn, And smiling view the error of my fear; No brutal force, no ravisher is near; A harmless roebuck gave the rustling sounds, Lo, from the thicket swift as thee he bounds! Ah, vain the hope to tire thee in the chace! I faint, yet hear, yet turn thy lovely face. Vain are thy fears; were ev'n thy will to yield The harvest of my hope, that harvest field My fate would guard, and walls of brass would rear Between my fickle and the golden ear. Yet fly me not; fo may thy youthful prime Ne'er fly thy cheek on the grey wings of time. Yet hear, the last my panting breath can fay, Nor proudest kings, nor mightiest hosts can sway Fate's dread decrees; yet thou, O nymph, divine, Yet thou canst more, yet thou canst conquer mine. Unmoved each other yielding nymph I fee; Joy to their lovers, for they touch not thee! But thee—Oh, every transport of desire, That melts to mingle with its kindred fire, For thee respires alone I feel for thee The dear wild rage of longing extacy:

By all the flames of fympathy divine To thee united, thou by right art mine. From thee, from thee the hallowed transport flows That severed rages, and for union glows: Heaven owns the claim-Hah, did the lightning glare: Yes, I beheld my rival, though the air Grew dim; even now I heard him fofty tread. Oh rage, he waits thee on the flowery bed! I see, I see thee rushing to his arms, And finking on his bosom, all thy charms To him resigning in an eager kiss, All I implor'd, the whelming tide of bliss! And shall I see him riot on thy charms, Dissolved in joy exulting in thine arms— Oh burst, ye lightnings, round my destin'd head, Oh pour your flashes—madning 'as he said, Amid the windings of the bowery wood His trembling footsteps still the nymph pursued.

he rests its sate. As the translation in this instance exceeds the original in length, the objection of a foreign critic requires attention. An old purfy Abbé, (and Critics are apt to judge by themselves) may indeed be surprized that a man out of breath with running should be able to talk so long. But had he consulted the experience of others, he would have found it was no wonderful matter for a stout and young Cavalier to talk twice as much, though satigued with the chace of a couple of miles, provided the supposition is allowed, that he treads on the last steps of his slying mistress.

^{1 —} Madning as he faid — At the end of his Homer Mr. Pope has given an index of the instances of imitative and sentimental harmony contained in his translations. He has also often in his notes pointed out the adoption of sound to sense. The Translator of the Lusiad hopes he may for once say, that he has not been inattentive to this great effential of good versistation; how he has succeeded the judicious only must determine. The speech of Leonard to the cursory reader may perhaps sometimes appear careless, and sometimes turgid and stiff. That speech, however, is an attempt at the imitative and sentimental harmony, and with the judicious Wooed to the flight she wing'd her speed to hear to ad T His amorous accents melting on her ear. noon vattal now And now she turns the wild walk's serpent maze, and T A roseate bower its velvet couch displays; and about bnA The thickest moss its softest verdure spread, when we want Crocus and mingling pansie fring'd the bed, and over on T The woodbine dropt its honey from above, the leitqua to ? And various rofes crown'd the fweet alcove. Here as she hastens, on the hopeless boy She turns her face all bathed in smiles of joy; alifoub datW Then, finking down, her eyes, fufficed with love 1713V3 v8 Glowing on his, one moment lost reprove. Here was no rival, all he wish'd his own; Lock'd in her arms foft finks the stripling down are doug Ah, what foft murmurs panting thro' the bowers mad adT Sigh'd to the raptures of the paramours; The wishful sigh and melting smile conspire, and being and Devouring kisses fan the hercer fire; blow garabaon an T Sweet violence with drearest grace affails, Soft o'er the purposed frown the smile prevails, The purposed frown betrays its own deceit, In well-pleas'd laughter ends the rifing threat; The coy delay glides, off in yielding love, the blow of T And transport murmurs thro' the facred grove. The joy of pleafing adds its facred zest, and and assignment And all is love, embracing and embraced. brown near I bak.

The golden morn beheld the scenes of joy; Nor, fultry noon, mayst thou the bowers annoy; The fultry noon-beam shines the lover's aid, And fends him glowing to the fecret shade. O'er every shade and every nuptial bower The love-fick strain the virgin turtles pour; For nuptial faith and holy rites combin'd, The Lufian heroes and the nymphs conjoin'd. With flowery wreaths, and laurel chaplets, bound With ductile gold, the nymphs the heroes crown'd: By every spousal holy ritual ty'd, No chance they vow shall e'er their hands divide, In life, in death attendant as their fame; Such was the oath of ocean's fovereign Dame: The Dame, (from Heaven and holy Vesta sprung, For ever beauteous and for ever young,) Enraptured views the Chief whose deathless name The wondering world and conquer'd feas proclaim. With stately pomp she holds the Hero's hand, And gives her empire to his dread command, By spousal ties confirm'd; nor past untold What Fate's unalter'd page had will'd of old: The world's vast globe in radiant sphere she shew'd, The shores immense, and seas unknown, unplow'd; The feas, the shores, due to the Lusian keel And Lusian sword, she hastens to reveal.

The glorious Leader by the hand she takes,
And dim below the flowery bowers forsakes.
High on a mountain's starry top divine
Her palace walls of living chrystal shine;
Of gold and chrystal blaze the losty towers;
Here bathed in joy they pass the blissful hours:
Ingulph'd in tides on tides of joy, the day
Ondowny pinions glides unknown away.
While thus the sovereigns in the palace reign,
Like transport riots o'er the humbler plain,
Where each in generous triumph o'er his peers
His lovely bride to every bride prefers.

Hence, ye profane—the fong melodious rose, By mildest zephyrs wasted through the boughs, Unseen the warblers of the holy strain—

Far from these sacred bowers, ye leud profane!

Hence each unhallowed eye, each vulgar ear;

Chaste and divine are all the raptures here.

The nymphs of ocean, and the ocean's Queen.

The isle angelic, every raptured scene observed, that in every other poet the lovefeenes are generally described as those of guilt and remorse. The contrary character of those of Camoens, not only gives them a delicacy unknown to other moderns; but by the fiction of the spousal rites, the allegory and machinery of the poem are most happily conducted. See the Introduction.

BOOK IX. THE LUSIAD. 409

The charms of honour and its meed confess, These are the raptures, these the wedded bliss: The glorious triumph and the laurel crown, The ever bloffom'd palms of fair renown, By time unwither'd and untaught to cloy; These are the transports of the Isle of Joy. Such was Olympus and the bright abodes; Renown was heaven, and heroes were the gods. Thus ancient times, to virtue ever just, Winds thus the x-week To arts and valour rear'd the worshipp'd bust. High, steep and rugged, painful to be trod, With toils on toils immense is virtue's road; But smooth at last the walks umbrageous smile, Smooth as our lawns, and cheerful as our ifle. Up the rough road Alcides, Hermes, strove, All men like you, Apollo, Mars, and Jove: Like you to bless mankind Minerva toil'd; Diana bound the tyrants of the wild; Honer rich o leite outer O'er the waste desert Bacchus spread the vine; And Ceres taught the harvest field to shine. Fame rear'd her trumpet; to the blest abodes She raifed, and hail'd them gods and sprung of gods.

The love of Fame, by heaven's own hand imprest, The first and noblest passion of the breast, May yet mislead—Oh guard, ye hero train, No harlot robes of honours false and vain, No tinfel yours, be yours all native gold, Well-earn'd each honour, each respect you hold: To your loved King return a guardian band, Return the guardians of your native land; To tyrant power be dreadful; from the jaws Of fierce oppression guard the peasant's cause. If youthful fury pant for shining arms, Spread o'er the Eastern World the dread " alarms; There bends the Saracen the hostile bow, The Saracen thy faith, thy nation's foe; There from his cruel gripe tear empire's reins, And break his tyrant sceptre o'er his chains. On adamantine pillars thus shall stand The throne, the glory of your native land, And Lusian heroes, an immortal line, Shall ever with us share our Isle Divine,

"Spread o'er the Eastern World the dread alarms.—This admonition places the whole design of the poem before us. To extirpate Mohammedism and propagate Christianity were professed as the principal purpose of the discoveries of Prince Henry and King Emmanuel. In the beginning of the Seventh Lusiad, the nations of Europe are upbraided for permitting the Saracens to erect and possess an empire, whose power alike threatened Europe and Christianity. The Portuguesse, however, the patriot poet concludes, will themselves overthrow their enormous power: an event which is the proposed subject of the Lusiad, and which is represented as, in effect, compleated in the last book. On this system, adopted by the poet, and which on every occasion was avowed by their Kings, the Portuguese made immense conquests in the East. Yet, let it be remembered, to the honour of Gama and the first commanders who followed his route, that the plots of the Moors, and their various breaches of treaty, gave rise to the first wars which the Portuguese waged in Asia. On finding that all the colonies of the Moors were combined for their destruction, the Portuguese declared twar against the eastern Moors and their allies wherever they found them. The course of human things however soon took place, and the sword of victory and power soon became the sword of tyranny and rapine.

DISSERTATION

DISSERTATION on the Fiction of the Island of Venus.

NOM the earliest ages, and in the most distant nations, palaces, forests and gardens, have been the favourite themes of poets. And though, as in Homer's island of Rhadamanthus, the description is sometimes only cursory; at other times they have lavished all their powers, and have vied with each other in adorning their edifices and landscapes. The gardens of Alcinous in the Odyssey, and the Elysium in the Eneid, have excited the ambition of many imitators. Many instances of these occur in the later writers. These subjects however, it must be owned, are so natural to the genius of poetry, that it is scarcely fair to attribute to an imitation of the classics, the innumerable descriptions of this kind, which abound in the old Romances. In these, under different allegorical names, every passion, every virtue and vice, had its palace, its inchanted bower, or its dreary cave. Among the Italians, on the revival of letters, Pulci, Boyardo, and others, borrowed these sictions from the Gothic Romancers; Ariosto borrowed from them, and Spenfer has copied Ariosto and Tasso. In the fixth and seventh books of the Orlando Furioso, there is a fine description of the island and palace of Alcina or Vice; and in the tenth book, but inferior to the other in poetical colouring, we have a view of the country of Logistilla or Virtue. The passage, of this kind, however, where Ariosto has displayed the richest poetical painting, is in the xxxiv book, in the description of Paradise, whither he sends Astolpho the English Duke, to ask the help of St. John to recover the wits of Orlando. The whole is most admirably fanciful. Aftolpho mounts the clouds on the winged horse, sees Paradise, and, accompanied by the Evangelist, visits the moon; the adventures in which orb are almost literally translated in Milton's Limbo. But the paffage which may be faid to bear the nearest resemblance to the descriptive part of the island of Venus, is the landscape of l'aradise, of which the ingenious Mr. Hoole, to whose many acts of friendship I am proud to acknowledge myself indebted, has obliged me with his translation, though only ten books of his Ariosto are yet published.

O'er the glad earth the blissful feason pours The vernal beauties of a thousand flowers In vary'd tints: there shew'd the ruby's hue, The yellow topaz, and the sapphire blue. The mead appears one intermingled blaze Where pearls and diamonds dart their trembling rays.

Not emerald here so bright a verdure yields As the fair turf of those celestial fields. On every tree the leaves unfading grow, The fruitage ripens and the flowrets blow! The frolic hirds, gay-plum'd, of various wing Amid the boughs their notes melodious fing: Still lakes, and murmuring streams, with waters clear,

Charm the fix'd eye, and lull the listening ear. A fostening genial air, that ever seems In even tenor, cools the folar heams With fanning breeze; while from th' enamell'd

Whate'er the fruits, the plants, the blossoms

Of grateful scent, the stealing gales dispense The blended sweets to feed th' immortal sense.

Amid the plain a palace dazzling bright, Like living flame emits a streamy light, And wrapt in splendor of resulgent day Outshines the firength of every mortal ray.

Astolpho gently now directs his speed To where the spacious pile enfolds the mead In circuit wide, and views with eager eyes Each nameless charm that happy soil supplies. With this compar'd he deems the world below A dreary defart and a feat of woe! By Heaven and Nature, in their wrath bestow'd, In evil hour for man's unblest abode.

Near and more near the stately walls he drew, In stedfast gaze transported at the view: They feem'd one gem entire, of purer red Than deepening gleans transparent rubies fhed. Stupendous work! by art Dædalian rais'd, Transcending all, by feeble mortals prais'd! No more hence forth let boatling tongues proclaim Those wonders of the world, so chronicled by fame!

Camoens read and admired Ariosto; but it by no means follows that he borrowed the hint of his island of Venus from that poet. The luxury of flowery description is as common in poetry as are the tales of love. The heroes of Ariosto meet beautiful women in the palace of Alcina:

Before

412

Before the threshold wanton damsels wait, Or sport between the pillars of the gate: But beauty more had brighten'd in their face Had modesty attemper'd every grace; In vestures green each dansel swept the ground, Their temples fair with leafy garlands crown'd. These, with a courteous welcome, led the knight To this sweet Paradise of soft delight.... Enamour'd youths and tender damsels seem To chant their loves beside a purling stream. Some by a branching tree or mountain's shade In sports and dances press the downy glade, While one discloses to his friend, apart, The secret transports of his amorous heart.

But these descriptions also, which bring the heroes of knight errantry into the way of beautiful wantons, are as common in the old romances as the use of the alphabet; and indeed the greatest part of these love adventures are evidently borrowed from the sable of Circe. Astolpho, who was transformed into a myrtle by Alcina, thus informs Rogero;

Her former lovers the efteem'd no more, For many lovers the posses'd before;
I was her joy
Too late, alas, I found her wavering mind In love inconstant as the changing wind!
Scarce had I held two months the Fairy's grace, When a new youth was taken to my place:
Rejected then I join'd the banish'd herd
That lost her love, as others were preferr'd...
Some here, some there, her potent charms retain, In diverse forms imprison'd to remain;
In beeches, olives, palms, or cedars clos'd,
Or such as me you here behold expos'd;
In fountains some, and some in beasts consin'd,
As suits the wayward Fairy's cruel mind.
Hoole, Ar. B. VI.

When incidents, character and conduct confess the resemblance, we may with certainty pronounce from whence the copy is taken. Where only a fimilar stroke of paffion or description occurs, it belongs alone to the arrogance of dulnefs, to tell us on what passage the poet had his eye. Every great poet has been persecuted in this manmer; Milton in particular. His commentators have not left him a flower of his own growth. Yet like the creed of the Athiest, their system is involved in the deepest abfurdity. It is easy to suppose, that men of poetical feelings, in describing the same thing, should give us the same picture. But that the Paradise Lost, which forms one animated whole of the noblest poetry, is a mere cento, compiled from innumerable authors, ancient and modern, is a supposition which gives Milton a cast of talents infinitely more extraordinary and inexplicable, than the great-est poetical genius. When Gasper Poussin painted clouds and trees in his landscapes, he did not borrow the green and the blue of the leaf and the sky from Claud Lerain. Neither did Camoens, when he painted hia island of Venus, spend the half of his life in collecting his colours from all his predecessors, who had described the beauties of the vernal year or the stages of passion. Camoens knew how others had painted the flowery bowers of love; these formed his taste and corrected his judgment. He viewed the beauties of nature with poetical eyes, from thence he drew his landscapes; he had felt all the allurements of love, and from thence he describes the agitations of that passion.

Nor is the description of fairy bowers and palaces, though most favourite topics, pe-culiar to the romances of chivalry. The poetry of the Orientals also abounds with them, yet with some characteristical differences. Like the conflitutions and drefs of the Asiatics, the landscapes of the eatherin Muse are warm and feeble, brilliant and flight, and, like the manners of the people, wear an eternal sameness. The western Muse, on the contrary, is nervous as her heroes, fometimes flowery as her Italian or English fields, sometimes majestically great as her Runic forests of oak and pine; and always various as the character of her inhabitants. Yet with all these differences of feature, several Oriental sections greatly refemble the island of Circe and the slowery dominions of Alcina. In particular, the adventures of Prince Agib, or the third Calander, in the Arabian Tales, afford a striking likeness of painting and catastrophe.

If Ariosto however seem to resemble any eastern siction, the Island of Venus in Camoens bears a more striking resemblance to a passage in Chaucer. The following beautiful piece of poetical painting occurs in the Assembly of the Fowles:

The bildir Oak, and eke the hardie Ashe, The pillir Elme, the cossir unto caraine, The Boxe pipetre, the Holme to whippis lasshe, The failing Firre, the Cypres deth to plaine, The shortir Ewe, the Aspe for shaftis plaine, The Olive of pece, and eke the dronkin Vine, The victor Palme, the Laurir to Divine. A gardein fawe I full of blosomed bowis,
Upon a River, in a grené Mede
If here as sweteness evirmore inough is,
With flouris white, and blewe, yelowe, and rede,
And colde and clere Wellestremis, nothing dede,
That swommin full of smale fishis light,
With finnis rede, and scalis filver bright.

On every bough the birdis herd I fyng With voice of angell, in ther harmonie That bussed 'hem, ther birdis forthe to bryng, And little pretie conies to ther plaie gan hie; And furthir all about I gan espie The dredful roe, the buck, the hart and hind, Squirils, and bestis smal of gentle kind.

Of instrumentes of stringis, in accorde Herd I so plaie a ravishing swetnesse. That God, that makir is of all and Lorde, Ne herd nevir a better, as I gesse, There with a winde, unneth it might be lesse, Made in the levis grene a noise soft. Accordant to the soulis song on lost.

The aire of the place so attempre was, That ner was there grevaunce of hot ne cold—

Under a tre beside a well I seye Cupid our lorde his arrowes forge and file, And at his fete his bowe all redie laye, And well his doughtir temprid all the while The heddis in the well, and with her wile She couchid 'hem aftir as thei should serve, Some for to slea, and some to wound and carve.

And upon pillirs grete of Jaspir long
I saw a temple of Brasse isounded strong.

And about the temple dauncid alwaie
Women inow, of which some there ywere
Faire of 'hemself, and some of 'hem were gaie,
In kirtils all desheveled went thei there,
That was ther office er from yere to yere,
And on the temple sawe. I white and faire
Of dovis sittyng many a thousande paire.

Here we have Cupid forging his arrows, the woodland, the streams, the music of instruments and birds, the frolicks of deer and other animals; and avomen inev. In a word, the ssale of Venus is here sketched out, yet Chaucer was never translated into Latin or any language of the Continent, nor did Camoens understand a line of English. The subject was common, and the same poetical feelings in Chaucer and Camoens, pointed out to each what were the beauties of landscapes and of bowers devoted to pleasure.

Yet, though the fiction of bowers, of istands, and palaces, was no novelty in poetry, much however remains to be attributed to the poetical powers and invention of Camoens. The island of Venus contains, of all others, by much the compleatest gradation, and fullest assemblage of that species of luxuriant painting. Nothing in the older writers is equal to it in fullness. Nor can the island of Armida in Tasso be compared to it, in poetical embroidery or paffionate expression; though Tasso as undoubtedly built upon the model of Cameens, as Spenfer appropriated the imagery of Tasso, when he described the bower of Acrasia, part of which he has literally translated from the Italian poet. The beautiful fictions of Armida and Acrasia however are much too long to be here inferted, and they are well known to every reader of taste.

But the chief praise of our Poet is yet unmentioned. The introduction of so beautiful a fiction, as an essential part of the conduct and machinery of an Epic Poem, does the greatest honour to the invention of Camoens. The machinery of the former part of the poem not only acquires dignity but is compleated by it. And the conduct of Homer and Virgil, has in this not only received a fine imitation, but a masterly contraft. In the finest allegory the heroes of the Lusiad receive their reward; and by means of this allegory our l'oct gives a noble imitation of the noblest part of the Eneid. In the tenth Lufiad, Gama and his heroes hear the nymphs in the divine palace of Thetis fing the triumphs of their countrymen in the conquest of India: after this the Goddess shews Gama a view of the Eastern World, from the Cape of Good Hope to the furthest islands of Japan. She poetically describes every region and the principal islands, and concludes, All these are given to the Western World by You. It is imposfible any poem can be summed up with greater sublimity. The Fall of Troy is nothing to this. Nor is this all: the most masterly siction, finest compliment, and ultimate purpose of the Eneid, is not only nobly imitated, but the conduct of Homer, in concluding the Iliad, as already observed, is paralleled, without one circumstance being borrowed. Poetical conduct cannot possibly bear a stronger resemblance, than the reward of the heroes of the Lufiad, the prophetic fong, and the vision shewn to Gama, bear to the games at the funeral of Patroclus and the redemption of the body of Hector, confidered as the completion of the anger of Achilles, the subject of the Iliad. Nor is it a greater honour to resemble a Homer and a Virgil, than it is to be resembled by a Milton. Milton certainly heard of Fanshaw's translation of the Lusiad, though he might never have seen the original, for it was published source years before he gave his Paradise Lost to the world. But whatever he knew of it, had the last book of the Lusiad been two thousand years known to the learned, every one would have owned that the two last books of the Paradise Lost were evidently formed upon it. But whether Milton borrowed any hint from Camoens, is of little consequence. That the genius of the great Milton suggested the conclusion of his immortal Poem in the manner and machinery of the Lusiad, is enough. It is enough that the part of Michael and Adam in the two last books of the Paradise Lost, are in point of conduct exactly the same with the part of Thetis and Gama in the conclusion of the Lusiad. Yet this difference must be observed; in the narrative of his last book, Milton has stagged, as Addison calls it, and fallen infinitely short of the untired spirit of the Portuguese Poet.

END OF THE NINTH BOOK.

THE

L U S I A D.

BOOK X.

A R o'er the western ocean's distant bed Apollo now his fiery coursers sped, Far o'er the silver lake of Mexic * roll'd His rapid chariot wheels of burning gold:

* Far o'er the filver lake of Mexic.—
The city of Mexico is environed with an extensive lake; or, according to Cortez, in his second narration to Charles V. with two lakes, one of fresh, the other of salt water, in circuit about fifty leagues. This situation, said the Mexicans, was appointed by their God Vitziliputzli, who, according to the explanation of their picture-histories, led their fore-fathers a journey of sourscore years, in search of the promised land; the apish Devil, say some Spanish writers, in this imitating the journies of the Israelites. Four of the principal priests carried the Idol in a coffer of reeds. Whenever they halted they built a tabernacle for their God in the midst of their camp, where they placed the cosser and the altar. They then sowed the land, and their stay or departure, without regard to the harvest, was directed by the orders received from their idol, till at last by his command they fixed their abode on the site of Mexico. The origin of the Mexicans is represented by men coming out of caves, and their different journies and encampments are pourtrayed in their picture-histories; one of which was sent to Charles V. and is said to be still extant in the Escurial. According to the reigns of their kings, their first emigration was about A.D.720. Vide Boterus, Gomara, Acosta, and other Spanish writers.

The

The eastern sky was left to dusky grey, And o'er the last hot breath of parting day, Cool o'er the fultry noon's remaining flame, On gentle gales the grateful twilight came. Dimpling the lucid pools the fragrant breeze Sighs o'er the lawns and whifpers thro' the trees; Refresh'd the lilly rears the filver head, And opening jesmines o'er the arbours spread. Fair o'er the wave that gleam'd like distant snow, Graceful arose the moon, serenely slow; Not yet full orb'd, in clouded splendor drest, Her married arms embrace her pregnant breast. Sweet to his mate, recumbent o'er his young, The nightingale his spousal anthem sung; From every bower the holy chorus rose, From every bower the rival anthem flows. Translucent twinkling through the upland grove In all her lustre shines the star of love; Led by the facred ray from every bower, A joyful train, the wedded lovers pour: Each with the youth above the rest approved, Each with the nymph above the rest beloved, They feek the palace of the fovereign dame; High on a mountain glow'd the wondrous frame: Of gold the towers, of gold the pillars shone, The walls were chrystal starr'd with precious stone. Amid the hall arose the festive board With nature's choicest gifts promiscuous stor'd: So will'd the Goddess to renew the smile Of vital strength, long worn by days of toil. On chrystal chairs that shined as lambent slame Each gallant youth attends his lovely dame; Beneath a purple canopy of state The beauteous goddess and the leader sate: The banquet glows --- Not fuch the feast, when all The pride of luxury in Egypt's hall Before the love-fick b Roman spread the boast Of every teeming sea and fertile coast. Sacred to noblest worth and Virtue's ear, Divine as genial was the banquet here; The wine, the fong, by fweet returns inspire, Now wake the lover's, now the hero's fire. On gold and filver from th' Atlantic main, The fumptuous tribute of the fea's wide reign, Of various favour was the banquet piled; Amid the fruitage mingling roses smiled. In cups of gold that shed a yellow light, In filver shining as the moon of night, Amid the banquet flow'd the sparkling wine, Nor gave Falernia's fields the parent vine: Falernia's vintage nor the fabled power Of Jove's ambrofia in th' Olympian bower

Before the lowe-fick Roman. Mark Anthony.

4.18

To this compare not; wild nor frantic fires, Divinest transport this alone inspires. The beverage foaming o'er the goblet's breast The chrystal fountain's cooling aid confest; The while, as circling flow'd the cheerful bowl, Sapient discourse, the banquet of the soul, Of richest argument and brightest glow, Array'd in dimpling smiles, in easiest flow Pour'd all its graces: nor in filence stood The powers of music, such as erst subdued The horrid frown of Hell's profound domains, And footh'd the tortur'd ghosts to slumber on their chains. To music's sweetest chords in loftiest vein, An angel Syren joins the vocal strain; The filver roofs refound the living fong, The harp and organ's lofty mood prolong The hallowed warblings; liftening Silence rides The sky, and o'er the bridled winds presides;

The beverage—the fountain's cooling aid confest.—It was a custom of the ancients in warm climates to mix the coolest fpring water with their wine, immediately before drinking; not, we may suppose, to render it less intoxicating, but on account of the cooling flavour it thereby received. Homer tells us that the wine which Ulysses gave to Polypheme would bear twenty mea-fures of water. Modern luxury has substi-tuted preserved ice, in place of the more ancient mixture.

d Music, such as erst subdued the horrid frown of Hell, &c.—Alluding to the sable of Orpheus. Fanshaw's translation, as already observed, was published fourteen years before the Paradife Lost. These lines of Milton,

What could it less when spirits immortal sung? Their song was partial, but the harmony Suspended Hell, and took with ravishment The thronging audience-bear a resemblance to these of Fanshaw,

Mufical instruments not wanting, such As to the damned spirits once gave ease In the dark vaults of the infernal Hall.—

To flumber amid their punishment, though omitted by Fanshaw, is literal,

Fizerao descançar da eterna pena-

In foftest murmurs flows the glassy deep, And each, lull'd in his shade, the bestials sleep. The lofty fong ascends the thrilling skies, The fong of godlike heroes yet to rise; Jove gave the dream, whose glow the Syren fired, And prefent Jove the prophecy inspired. Not he, the bard of love-fick Dido's board, Nor he the minstrel of Phæacia's lord, Though fam'd in fong, could touch the warbling string, Or with a voice fo fweet, melodious fing. And thou, my Muse, O fairest of the train, Calliope, inspire my closing strain. No more the fummer of my life * remains, My autumn's lengthening evenings chill my veins; Down the bleak stream of years by woes on woes Wing'd on, I hasten to the tomb's repose, The port whose deep dark bottom shall detain My anchor never to be weigh'd again, Never on other sea of life to steer The human course—Yet thou, O goddess, hear, often talks to his Muse, introduced, on these favourable opportunities, any little picture or history of himself, these digressions would have been the most interesting parts of his works. Had any such little history of Homer complained like this of Camoens, it would have been bedewed with the tears of ages.

No more the summer of my life remains.—It is not certain when Camoens wrote this. It feems however not long to precede the publication of his poem, at which time he was in his fifty-fifth year. This apostrophe to his Muse may perhaps by some be blamed as another digression; but so little does it require desence, that one need not hesitate to assirm, that had Homer, who

Yet let me live, though round my silver'd head Misfortune's bitterest rage unpitying shed Her coldest storms; yet let me live to crown The song that boasts my nation's proud renown.

Of godlike heroes fung the nymph divine,
Heroes whose deeds on Gama's crest shall shine;
Who through the seas by Gama first explor'd
Shall bear the Lusian standard and the sword,
Till every coast where roars the orient main,
Blest in its sway, shall own the Lusian reign;
Till every Pagan king his neck shall yield,
Or vanquish'd gnaw the dust on battle field.

High Priest of Malabar, the goddess sung,
Thy faith repent not, nor lament thy wrong;
Though for thy faith to Lusus generous race
The raging Zamoreem thy sields deface:
From Tagus, lo, the great Pacheco sails,
To India wasted on auspicious gales.
Soon as his crooked prow the tide shall press,
A new Achilles shall the tide confess;

armies to dethrone him. His fidelity to the Portuguese was unalterable, though his affairs were brought to the lowest ebb. For an account of this war, and the almost incredible atchievements of Pacheco, see the history in the presace.

Thy faith repent not, nor lament thy aurong.—P. Alvarez Cabral, the second Portuguese commander who sailed to India, entered into a treaty of alliance with Timumpara king of Cochin and high priest of Malabar. The Zamorim raised powerful

His ship's strong sides shall groan beneath his weight,
And deeper waves receive the sacred freight.

Soon as on India's strand he shakes his spear,
The burning East shall tremble, chill'd with fear;
Reeking with noble blood Cambalao's stream
Shall blaze impurpled to the evening beam;
Urged on by raging shame the Monarch brings,
Banded with all their powers, his vassal kings:
Narsinga's rocks their cruel thousands pour,
Bipur's stern king attends, and thine, Tanore:
To guard proud Calicut's imperial pride
All the wide North sweeps down its peopled tide:

& His ship's strong sides shall groan beneath their weight, And deeper waves receive the sacred freight.—Thus Virgil;

Ingentem Æncam. Gemuit sub pondere cymba Sutilis, & multam accepit rimosa paludem.

That the visionary boat of Charon groaned under the weight of Eneas is a fine poetical stroke; but that the crazy rents let in the water is certainly lowering the image. The thought however, as managed in Camoens, is much grander than in Virgil, and affords a happy instance, where the hyperbole is truly poetical.

Poetical allusions to, or abridgements of historical events, are either extremely infipid and obscure, or particularly pleasing to the reader. To be pleasing, a previous acquaintance with the history is necessary, and for this reason the poems of Homer and Virgil were peculiarly relished by their countrymen. When a known circumstance is placed in an animated poetical view, and cloathed with the graces of poetical language, a sensible mind must feel the effect. But when the circumstance is unknown, nothing but the most lively imagery and finest colouring can prevent it from being tiresome.

The Lufiad affords many instances which must be highly pleasing to the Portuguese, but dry to those who are unacquainted with their history. Nor need one hesitate to affert, that were we not acquainted with the Roman history from our childhood, a great part of the Eneid would appear to us intollerably uninteresting. Sensible of this disadvantage which every version of historical poetry must suffer, the Translator has not only in the notes added every incident which might elucidate the subject, but has also, all along, in the episode in the third and fourth books, in the description of the painted ensigns in the eighth, and in the allusions in the present book, endeavoured to throw every historical incident into that univerfal language, the picturesque of poetry. The circumstances unsusceptible of imagery are hastened over, and those which can best receive it, presented to the view. When Hector storms the Grecian camp, when Achilles marches to battle, every reader understands and is affected with the bold painting. But when Nestor talks of his exploits at the funereal games of Amarynces, (Iliad. xxiii.) the critics themselves cannot comprehend him, and have vied with each other in inventing explanations.

Join'd are the fects that never touch'd before, By land the Pagan, and by fea the Moor. O'er land, o'er sea the great Pacheco strews The prostrate spearmen, and the founder'd h proas. Submis and filent, palfied with amaze Proud Malabar th' unnumbered slain surveys: Yet burns the Monarch; to his shrine he speeds; Dire howl the priests, the groaning victim bleeds; The ground they stamp, and from the dark abodes With tears and vows they call th' infernal gods. Enrag'd with dog-like madness to behold His temples and his towns in flames enroll'd, Secure of promised victory, again. He fires the war, the lawns are heapt with sain. With stern reproach he brands his routed Nayres, And for the dreadful field Himself prepares; His harnefs'd thousands to the fight he leads, And rides exulting where the combat bleeds: Amid his pomp his robes are sprinkled o'er, And his proud face dash'd with his 'menials' gore: From his high couch he leaps, and speeds to flight On foot inglorious, in his army's fight. Hell then he calls, and all the powers of hell, The fecret poison, and the chanted spell;

h Proas—or paraos, Indian vessels which lie low on the water, are worked with oars, and carry 100 men and upwards apiece.

bis robes are sprinkled o'er,

And his proud face dash'd with his menials'
gore.—See the history in the preface.

Vain as the spell the poison's rage is shed, For Heaven defends the hero's facred head. Still fiercer from each wound the Tyrant burns, Still to the field with heavier force returns; The feventh dread war he kindles; high in air The hills dishonour'd lift their shoulders bare; Their woods roll'd down now strew the river's side. Now rife in mountain turrets o'er the tide; Mountains of fire and spires of bickering flame, While either bank resounds the proud acclaim, Come floating down, round Lusus' fleet to pour Their fulphrous entrails in a burning k shower. Oh vain the hope—Let Rome her boast resign; Her palms, Pacheco, never bloom'd like thine; Nor Tyber's bridge, nor Marathon's 'red field, Nor thine, Thermopylæ, such deeds beheld; Nor Fabius' arts fuch rushing storms repell'd. Swift as repulfed the famished wolf returns Fierce to the fold, and, wounded, fiercer burns; So swift, so fierce, seven times, all India's might Returns unnumber'd to the dreadful fight;

* _____ round Lusus' fleet to pour their sulphrous entrails. — How Pacheco avoided this formidable danger, see the history in the preface.

Roman history, however, at this period, is often mixt with fable. Miltiades obtained a great victory over Darius at Marathon. The stand of Leonidas is well known. The battles of Pacheco were in defence of the fords by which the city of Cochin could only be entered. The numbers he withstood by land and sea, and the victories he obtained, are much more assonishing than the stand at Thermopylæ. See the presace.

¹ Nor Tyber's bridge.—When Porfenna befieged Rome, Horatius Cocles defended the pass of a bridge till the Romans destroyed it behind him. Having thus saved the pass, heavy armed as he was, he swimmed across the river to his companions. The

One hundred spears, seven times in dreadful stower, Strews in the dust all India's raging power.

The lofty fong, for paleness o'er her spread, The nymph suspends, and bows the languid head; Her faultering words are breath'd on plaintive fighs, Ah, Belisarius, injured Chief, she cries, Ah, wipe thy tears; in war thy rival see, Injured Pacheco falls despoil'd like thee; In him, in thee dishonour'd virtue bleeds, And valour weeps to view her fairest deeds, Weeps o'er Pacheco, where, forlorn he lies Low on an alms-house " bed, and friendless dies. Yet shall the Muses plume his humble bier, And ever o'er him pour th' immortal tear; Though by thy king, alone to thee unjust, Thy head, great Chief, was humbled in the dust, Loud shall the Muse indignant sound thy praise, "Thou gavest thy Monarch's throne its proudest blaze." While round the world the sun's bright car shall ride, So bright shall shine thy name's illustrious pride; Thy Monarch's glory, as the moon's pale beam, Eclipsed by thine, shall shed a sickly gleam. Such meed attends when foothing flattery sways, And blinded State its facred trust betrays!

Low on an alms-bouse bed. See the history in the preface.

Again the Nymph exalts her brow, again Her swelling voice resounds the lofty strain: Almeyda comes, the kingly name he bears, Deputed royalty his standard rears: In all the generous rage of youthful fire The warlike fon attends the warlike fire. Quiloa's blood-stain'd tyrant now shall feel The righteous vengeance of the Lusian steel. Another prince, by Lisbon's throne beloved, Shall bless the land, for faithful deeds approved. Mombaze shall now her treason's meed behold, When curling flames her proudest domes enfold: Involved in smoak, loud crashing, low shall fall The mounded temple and the castled wall. O'er India's seas the young Almeyda pours, Scorching the wither'd air, his iron showers; Torn masts and rudders, hulks and canvas riven, Month after month before his prows are driven; But Heaven's dread will, where clouds of darkness rest, That awful will, which knows alone the best, Now blunts his spear: Cambaya's squadrons joined With Egypt's fleets, in pagan rage combined, Engrasp him round; red boils the staggering flood, Purpled with volleying flames and hot with blood: Whirl'd by an iron thunder bolt, his thigh In shivers torn flies hissing o'er the sky:

Bound to the mast the godlike hero "stands, Waves his proud fword and cheers his woeful bands. Though winds and feas their wonted aid deny, To yield he knows not, but he knows to die: Another thunder tears his manly breast: Oh fly, blest spirit, to thy heavenly rest — Hark, rolling on the groaning storm I hear, Refiftless vengeance thundering on the rear! I fee the transports of the furious fire, As o'er the mangled corse his eyes flash fire. Swift to the fight, with stern though weeping eyes, Fixt rage fierce burning in his breast, he flies; Fierce as the bull that fees his rival rove Free with the heifers through the mounded grove, On oak or beech his madning fury pours; So pours Almeyda's rage on Dabul's towers. His vanes wide waving o'er the Indian sky, Before his prows the fleets of India * fly;

Almeyda attacked the combined fleets of Egypt, Cambaya, and the Zamorim, in the entrance and harbour of Diu, or Dio. The fleet of the Zamorim almost immediately fled. That of Melique Yaz, Lord of Diu, suffered much; but the greatest flaughter fell upon the Egyptians and Turks, commanded by Mir-Hocem, who had defeated and killed the young Almeyda. Of 800 Mamulucks or Turks, who fought under Mir-Hocem, only 22, says Oforius, survived this engagement. Melique Yaz, says Faria y Seusa, was born in slavery, and descended of the Christians of Roxia. The road to preferment is often a dirty one; but Melique's was much less to than that of many. As the king of Cambaya was one day riding in

Bound to the mast the godlike hero stands.—The English history assords an instance of similar resolution in Admiral Bembo, who was supported in a wooden frame, and continued the engagement after his legs and thighs were shivered in splinters. Contrary to the advice of his officers the young Almeyda resused to bear off, though almost certain to be overpowered, and though both wind and tide were critically against him. His father had sharply upbraided him for a some retreat, where victory was thought impossible. He now fell the victim of his father's ideas of military glory. See the preface.

the fleets of India fly.—After having cleared the Indian seas, the Viceroy

On Egypt's chief his mortars' dreadful tire Shall vomit all the rage of prison'd fire: Heads, limbs and trunks shall choak the struggling tide, Till every furge with reeking crimfon dyed, Around the young Almeyda's hapless urn His conquerors' naked ghosts shall howl and mourn. As meteors flashing through the darken'd air I fee the victors' whirling faulchions glare; Dark rolls the fulphrous smoke o'er Dio's skies, And shrieks of death and shouts of conquest rise, In one wide tumult blended: The rough roar Shakes the brown tents on Ganges' trembling shore; The waves of Indus from the banks recoil; And matrons howling on the strand of Nile, By the pale moon their absent sons deplore; Long shall they wail; their fons return no more.

Ah, strike the notes of woe, the Syren cries,
A dreary vision swims before my eyes.
To Tagus' shore triumphant as he bends,
Low in the dust the Hero's glory ends:
Though bended bow, nor thundering engine's hail,
Nor Egypt's sword, nor India's spear prevail, state, an unlucky kite dunged upon his royal head. His majesty in great wrath swore he would give all he was worth to have the offender killed. Melique, who was an expert archer, immediately dispatched an arrow, which brought the audacious hawk to the ground. For the merit of this eminent fervice he was made Lord of Diu, or Dio, a confiderable city, the strongest and most important fortress at that time in all India. See Faria, L. 2. c. 2.

Fall shall the P Chief before a naked foe,
Rough clubs and rude hurl'd stones shall strike the blow;
The Cape of Tempests shall his tomb supply,
And in the desert sands his bones shall lie,
No boastful trophy o'er his ashes rear'd:
Such Heaven's dread will, and be that will rever'd!

But lo, resplendent shines another star,
Loud she resounds, in all the blaze of war!
Great ⁹ Cunia guards Melinda's friendly shore,
And dyes her seas with Oja's hostile gore;
Lamo and Brava's towers his vengeance tell:
Green Madagascar's slowery dales shall swell
His ecchoed same, till ocean's southmost bound
On isles and shores unknown his name resound.

Another blaze, behold, of fire and arms!

Great Albuquerk awakes the dread alarms:

O'er Ormuz' walls his thundering flames he pours,

While Heaven, the Hero's guide, indignant ' showers

Their arrows backward on the Persian foe,

Tearing the breasts and arms that twang'd the bow.

P Fall shall the Chief. — See the note on page 208.

arrows of the enemy backward upon their own ranks. Oforius fays, that many of the dead Perfians and Moors were found to have died by arrows. But as that weapon was not used by the Portuguese, he conjectures, that in their despair of victory many of the enemy had thus killed themselves, rather than survive the deseat.

Mountains

d'Acugna. See the history in the preface.

t Heaves indignant showers their arrows backward. — See the note on page 63. Some writers relate, that when Albuquerque besieged Ormuz, a violent wind drove the Mountains of falt and fragrant gums in vain

Were spent untainted to embalm the slain.
Such heaps shall strew the seas and faithless strand
Of Gerum, Mazcate, and Calayat's land,
Till faithless Ormuz own the Lusian sway,
And Barem's pearls her yearly safety pay.

What glorious palms on Goa's 'isle I see,
Their blossoms spread, great Albuquerk, for thee!
Through castled walls the Hero breaks his way,
And opens with his sword the dread array
Of Moors and Pagans; through their depth he rides,
Through spears and showering fire the battle guides.
As bulls enraged, or lions smear'd with gore,
His bands sweep wide o'er Goa's purpled shore.
Nor eastward far though fair Malacca 'lie,
Her groves embosom'd in the morning sky;
Though with her amorous sons the valiant line
Of Java's isle in battle rank combine,

* What glorious palms on Goa's ifle I fee.

This important place was made an Archbishoprick, the capital of the Portuguese empire in the East, and the seat of their Viceroys; for which purposes it is advantageously situated on the coast of Decan. It still remains in the possession of the Portuguese.

was one of the greatest actions of Albuquerque. It became the chief port of the eastern part of Portuguese India, and second only to Goa. Besides a great many pieces of ordnance which were carried away by the Moors who escaped, 3000 large cannon remained the prize of the victors. When Albuquerque was on the way to Malacca, he attacked a large ship, but just as his men were going to board her, she suddenly appeared all in slames, which obliged the Portuguese to bear off. Three days afterward the same vessel sent to Albuquerque, offering an alliance, which was accepted. The slames, says Oforius, were only artistical, and did not the least damage. Another wondersul adventure immediately happened. The admiral soon after sent his long boats to attack a ship commanded by one Nehoada Beeguea. The enemy made an obstinate resistance. Nehoada himself was pierced with several mortal I i i 2

Though poison'd shafts their ponderous quivers store;

Malacca's spicy groves and golden ore,

Great Albuquerk, thy dauntless toils shall crown!

Yet art thou "stain'd——Here with a sighful frown

The Goddess paused, for much remain'd unsung,

But blotted with an humble soldier's wrong:

wounds, but lost not one drop of blood, till a bracelet was taken off his arm, when immediately the blood gushed out. According to Osorius, this was said to be occasioned by the virtue of a stone in the bracelet taken out of an animal called Cabrissa, which when worn on the body could prevent the effusion of blood from the most grievous wounds.

" Yet art thou flain'd .-- A detail of all the great actions of Albuquerque would have been tedious and unpoetical. Camoens has: chosen the most brilliant, and has happily fuppressed the rest by a display of indigna-tion. The French translator has the following note on this passage, "Behold another "instance of our Author's prejudice! The " action which he condemns had nothing in " it blameable: but as he was of a most " amorous constitution, he thought every "fault which could plead an amour in its cause ought to be pardoned; but true heroes, such as Albuquerque, follow other " maxims. This great man had in his palace a beautiful Indian flave. He viewof ed her with the eyes of a father, and the 46 care of her education was his pleasure. " A Portuguese soldier, named Rny Diaz, had the boldness to enter the General's " apartment, where he fucceeded fo well " with the girl, that he obtained his desire. "When Albuquerque heard of it, he im-" mediately ordered him to the gallows."

Camoens, however, was no such undistinguishing libertine as this would represent him. In a few pages we find him praising the continence of Don Henry de Meneses, whose victory over his passions he calls the highest excellence of youth. Nor does it appear by what authority the Frenchman assures us of the chaste paternal affection which Albuquerque bore to this Indian girl. It was the great aim of Albuquerque to establish colonies in India, and for that purpose he encouraged his foldiers to marry with the natives. The most fightly girls were felected, and educated in the religion and household arts of Portugal, and portioned at the expence of the General. These he called his daughters, and with great pleasure he used to attend their weddings, several couples being usually joined together at one time. At one of these nuptials, says Faria, the festivity having continued late, and the brides being mixed together, several of the bridegrooms committed a blunder. The. mistakes of the night however, as they were: all equal in point of honour, were mutually forgiven in the morning, and each man took his proper wife whom he had received at the altar. This delicate anecdote of Albuquerque's fons and daughters, is as bad a commentary on the note of Castera, as it is on the feverity which the commander shewed to poor Diaz. Nor does Camoens stand alone in the condemnation of the General. The Historian agrees with the Poet. Mentioning the death of D. Antonio Noronha, "This gentleman, fays Faria, used to moderate the violent temper of his uncle " Albuquerque, which foon after shewed "itself in rigid severity. He ordered a soldier to be hanged for an amour with one of the slaves whom he called daughters, and whom he used to give in mar-" riage. When some of his officers asked " him what authority he had to take the " poor man's life, he drew his fword, told them that was his commission, and in-" stantly broke them." To marry his foldiers with the natives was the plan of Albuquerque, his severity therefore seems unaccountable, unless we admit the perhaps of Camoens, ou de cioso, perhaps it was jealoufy.--But whatever incensed the General, the execution of the foldier was contrary

Alas, she cries, when war's dread horrors reign, And thundering batteries rock the fiery plain, When ghastly famine on a hostile soil, When pale disease attends on weary toil, When patient under all the foldier stands, Detested be the rage which then demands The humble foldier's blood, his only crime The amorous frailty of the youthful prime! Incest's cold horror here no glow restained,... Nor facred nuptial bed was here prophaned, Nor here unwelcome force the virgin feized; A flave lascivious, in his fondling pleased, Refigns her breast ---- Ah, stain to Lusian fame! ('Twas lust of blood, perhaps 'twas jealous flame;) The Leader's rage, unworthy of the brave, Configns the youthful foldier to the grave. Not Ammon thus Apelles' love * repaid, Great Ammon's bed refign'd the lovely maid; contrary to the laws of every nation, and the honest indignation of Camoens against one of the greatest of his countrymen, one who was the grand architect of the Portuguese empire in the East, affords a noble instance of that manly freedom of sentiment which knows no right by which king or peer may do injustice to the meanest subject. Nor can we omit the observation, that the above note of Castera is of a piece with the French devotion we have already seen him pay to the name of king, a devotion which breathes the true spirit of the blessed advice given by Father Paul to the republic of Venice: "When a nobleman commits an of"fence against a subject, says the Jesuit, let "every means be tried to justify him. But if a subject has offended a nobleman, let him be punished with the utmost severity."

Not Ammon. — Campaspe, the most beautiful concubine of Alexander, was given by thar monarch to Apelles, whom he perceived in love with her. Araspas had strict charge of the fair captive Panthea. His attempt on her virtue was forgiven by Cyrus.

Osorius relates the affair of Diaz with some other circumstances; but with no difference that affects. this affertion.

Nor Cyrus thus reproved Araspas' fire: Nor haughtier Carlo thus assumed the fire. Though iron Baldwin to his daughter's bower, An ill-match'd lover, stole in secret hour: With nobler rage the lofty monarch glow'd, And Flandria's " earldom on the knight bestow'd.

Again the nymph the fong of fame resounds; Lo, sweeping wide o'er Ethiopia's bounds, Wide o'er Arabia's purple shore on high The Lusian ensigns blaze along the sky: Mecca, aghast, beholds the standards shine, And midnight horror shakes Medina's * shrine;

w And Flandria's earldom on the knight bestow'd. -- "Baldwin, surnamed Iron"arm, Grand Forester of Flanders, being " in love with Judith, the daughter of Charles the Bald and widow of Ethel-

" wolfe, king of England, obtained his " defire by force. Charles, though at first " he highly resented, afterwards pardoned

"his crime, and confented to his marriage with the Princess."

Castera.

This digression in the song of the nymph bears, in manner, a striking resemblance to the histories which often, even in the heat of battle, the heroes of Homer relate to each other. That these little episodes have their beauty and propriety in an Epic poem, will strongly appear from a view of M. de la Motte's translation of the Iliad into French verse. The four and twenty books of Homer lie has contracted into twelve, and these contain no more lines than about four books of the original. A thousand embelishments which the warm poetical feelings of Homer fuggested to him, are thus thrown out by the Frenchman. But what is the consequence of this improvement? The work of la Motte is unread, even by his own countrymen, and med is buried. About six years after Gama's discovery of India, the Sultan of Egypt fent Maurus, the abbot of the monks at Jerusalem, who inhabit Mount Sion, on an embassy to Pope Julius II. The Sultan, with fevere threats to the Christians of the East in case of refusal, intreated the Pope to defire Emmanuci king of Portugal to fend no more fleets to the Indian seas. The Pope fent Maurus to Emmanuel, who returned a very spirited answer to his Holinels, affuring him that no threats, no dangers could make him alter his resolutions, and lamenting that it had not yet been in his power to fulfil his purpose of demolishing the sepulchre and erazing the memorials of Mohammed from the earth. This, he fays, was the first purpose of sending his fleets to India. Nobis enim, cum iter in Indiam classibus nostris aperire, & regiones majoribus nostris incognitas explorare decrevimus, boc propositum suit, ut ipsum MabumeTh' unhallowed altar bodes th' approaching foe, Foredoom'd in dust its prophet's tomb to strew. Nor Ceylon's isle, brave Soarez, shall with-hold Its incense, precious as the burnish'd gold, What time o'er proud Columbo's loftiest spire Thy flag shall blaze: Nor shall th' immortal lyre Forget thy praise, Sequeyra! To the shore Where Sheba's sapient queen the 'sceptre bore, Braving the Red Sea's dangers shalt thou force To Abysfinia's realm thy novel course; And isles, by jealous nature long conceal'd, Shall to the wondering world be now reveal'd. Great Menez next the Lusian sword shall bear; Menez, the dread of Afric, high shall rear His victor fword, till deep shall Ormuz groan, And tribute doubled her revolt atone.

Now shines thy glory in meridian height,
And loud her voice she raised; O matchless Knight,
Thou, thou, illustrious Gama, thou shalt bring
The olive bough of peace, deputed King!

tanæ sestæ caput extingueremus— It is with great art that Camoens so often reminds us of the grand design of the expedition of his heroes, to subvert Mohammedism and found a Christian empire in the East. But the dignity which this gives his poem is already observed in the presace. bore. — The Abyfilinians contend that their country is the Sheba mentioned in the feripture, and that the queen who visited Solomon bore a son to that monarch, from whom their royal family, to the present time, is descended.

The lands by Thee discover'd shall obey

Thy scepter'd power, and bless thy regal sway.

But India's crimes, outrageous to the skies,

A length of these Saturnian days denies:

Snatch'd from thy golden throne the heavens shall claim

Thy deathless soul, the world thy deathless name.

THE

Now o'er the coast of faithless Malabar

Victorious Henry z pours the rage of war;

Nor less the youth a nobler strife shall wage,

Great victor of himself though green in age;

No restless slave of wanton amorous sire,

No lust of gold shall taint his generous ire.

While youth's bold pulse beats high, how brave the boy

Whom harlot smiles nor pride of power decoy!

Immortal be his name! Nor less thy praise,

Great Mascarene, shall suture ages raise:

T Snatch'd from thy golden throne.—Gama only reigned three months Viceroy of India. During his fecond voyage, the third which the Portuguese made to India, he gave the Zamorim some considerable deseats by sea, besides his victories over the Moors. These, however, are judiciously omitted by Camoens, as the less striking part of his character.

The French Translator is highly pleased with the prediction of Gama's death, delivered to himself at the seast. "The Syren, says he, persuaded that Gama is a hero exempt from weakness, does not hesitate to mention the end of his life. Gama listens without any mark of emotion;

" the feast and the song continue. If I am not deceived, this is truly great."

² Victorious Henry. — Don Henry de Menezes. He was only twenty-eight when appointed to the government of India. He died in his thirtieth year, a noble example of the most disinterested heroism. See the preface.

² Great Mascarene.—Pedro de Mascarenhas. The injustice done to this brave officer, and the usurpation of his governmentship by Lopez Vaz de Sampayo, afford one of the most interesting periods of the history of the Portuguese in India. See the preface.

Though power, unjust, with-hold the splendid ray That dignifies the crest of sovereign sway, Thy deeds, great Chief, on Bintam's humbled shore, Deeds fuch as Asia never view'd before, Shall give thy honest fame a brighter blaze Than tyrant pomp in golden robes displays. Though bold in war the fierce Usurper shine, Though Cutial's potent navy o'er the brine Drive vanquish'd; though the Lusian Hector's sword For him reap conquest, and confirm him Lord; Thy deeds, great Peer, the wonder of thy foes, Thy glorious chains unjust, and generous woes, Shall dim the fierce Sampayo's fairest fame, And o'er his honours thine aloud proclaim. Thy generous woes! Ah gallant injured Chief, Not thy own forrows give the sharpest grief. Thou seest the Lusian name her honours stain, And lust of gold her heroes' breasts profane; Thou feest ambition lift the impious head, Nor God's red arm, nor lingering justice dread; O'er India's bounds thou seest these vultures prowl, Full gorged with blood, and dreadless of controul; Thou feest and weepst thy country's blotted name, The generous forrow thine, but not the shame. Nor long the Lusian ensigns stain'd remain; Great Nunio b comes, and razes every stain.

See the preface.

Nunio de Cunha, one of the most worthy of the Portuguese governors.

K k k

Though

Though lofty Calè's warlike towers he rear; Though haughty Melic groan beneath his spear; Though Dio owe her safety to his name, These are the tinsel of his nobler fame. Far haughtier foes of Lusian race he braves; The awful fword of justice high he waves: Before his bar the injured Indian stands, And justice boldly on his foe demands, The Lusian foe; in wonder lost the Moor Beholds proud Rapine's vulture gripe restore; Beholds the Lusian hands in fetters bound By Lusian hands, and wound repay'd for wound. Oh, more shall thus by Nunio's worth be won, Than conquest reaps from high plumed hosts o'erthrown. Long shall the generous Nunio's blissful sway Command supreme. In Dio's hopeless day The sovereign toil the brave Noronha takes; Awed by his fame the fierce-foul'd Rumien ' shakes, And Dio's open'd walls in sudden flight forsakes. A fon of thine, O Gama, now shall d hold The helm of empire, prudent, wife and bold:

e Awed by bis fame. — That brave generous spirit, which prompted Camoens to condemn the great Albuquerque for injustice to a common soldier, has here deferted him. In place of poetical compliment, on the terrors of his name, Noronha deserved infamy. The siege of Dio, it is true, was raised on the report of his approach, but that report was the stratagem of Coje Zofar, one of the general officers of the affaillants. The delays of Noronha were as highly blameable, as his treatment of his predecessor, the excellent Nunio, was unworthy of a gentleman. See the history of the Portuguese Commanders in India, in the preface.

d' A son of thine, O Gama.—Stephen de Gama. See the preface.

Malacca

Malacca faved and strengthen'd by his arms, The banks of Tor shall eccho his alarms; His worth shall bless the kingdoms of the morn, For all thy virtues shall his foul adorn. When fate resigns thy hero to the skies, A Veteran, famed on Brazil's shore, shall " rise: The wide Atlantic and the Indian main, By turns shall own the terrors of his reign. His aid the proud Cambayan king implores, His potent aid Cambaya's king restores. The dread Mogul with all his thousands flies, And Dio's towers are Souza's well-earn'd prize. Nor less the Zamorim o'er blood-stain'd ground Shall speed his legions, torn with many a wound, In headlong rout. Nor shall the boastful pride Of India's navy, though the shaded tide Around the squadron'd masts appear the down Of some wide forest, other fate renown. Loud rattling through the hills of Cape Camore I hear the tempest of the battle roar! Clung to the splinter'd masts I see the dead Badala's shore with horrid wreck bespread;

This is as near the original as elegance will allow—de sangue cheyo—which Fan-shaw has thus punned, with no little lofs,

Sending him home again by Weeping-Crofs.

a place near Banbury in Oxfordshire.

Baticala

^{*} A Veteran sam'd on Brazil's shore.— Martin Alonzo de Souza. He was celebrated for clearing the coast of Brazil of several pirates, who were formidable to that infant colony.

Baticala inflamed by treachrous hate, Provokes the horrors of Badala's fate: Her feas in blood, her skies enwrapt in fire Confess the sweeping storm of Souza's ire. No hostile spear now rear'd on sea or strand, The awful sceptre graces Souza's hand; Peaceful he reigns, in counsel just and wise; And glorious Castro now his throne supplies: Castro, the boast of generous fame, afar From Dio's strand shall sway the glorious war. Madning with rage to view the Lusian band, A troop so few, proud Dio's towers command, The cruel Ethiop Moor to heaven complains, And the stern Persian foe his peers arraigns. The Rumien fierce, who boasts the name of 8 Rome, With these conspires, and vows the Lusians' doom. A thousand barbarous nations join their powers To bathe with Lusian blood the Dion towers. Dark rolling sheets forth belch'd from brazen wombs, Bored, as the showering cloud, with hailing bombs, of Rome.—When the victories of the Portuguese began to overspread the East, several Indian princes, by the counsels of the Moors, applied for assistance to the Sultan of Egypt and the Grand Signior. The troops of these Mohammedan princes were in the highest reputation for bravery, and though composed of many different nations, were known among the orientals by one common name. Ignorance delights in the marvellous. The history of ancient Rome made the fame figure among the Easterns, as that of the fabulous or heroic ages, does with us, with this difference, it was better believed. The Turks of Romania pretended to be the descendants of the Roman Conquerors, and the Indians gave them and their auxiliaries the name of Rumes, or Romans. In the same manner the same of Godfrey in the East conferred the name of Franks on all the western Christians, who on their part gave the name of Moors to all the Mohammedans of the East.

O'er Dio's sky spread the black shades of death, The mine's dread earthquakes shake the ground beneath. No hope, bold h Mascarene, mayst thou respire, A glorious fall alone, thy just desire. When lo, his gallant fon brave Castro sends -Ah heaven, what fate the hapless youth attends! In vain the terrors of his faulchion glare; The cavern'd mine bursts, high in pitchy air Rampire and squadron whirl'd convulsive, borne To heaven, the hero dies in fragments torn. His loftiest bough though fall'n, the generous fire His living hope devotes with Roman ire. On wings of fury flies the brave Alvar Through oceans howling with the wintery war, Through skies of snow his brother's vengeance bears; And foon in arms the valiant fire appears: Before him victory spreads her eagle-wing Wide fweeping o'er Cambaya's haughty king.

In vain his thundering courfers shake the ground,

Cambaya bleeding of his might's last wound

Wakes war on war; he bites his iron chain.

Sinks pale in dust: Fierce Hydal-Kan in vain

h No hope, bold Mascarene. The commander of Diu, or Dio, during this siege, one of the most memorable in the Portuguese history.

prince here mentioned, after many revolts, was at last finally subdued by Don John de Castro, the fourth Viceroy of India, with whose reign our Poet judiciously ends the prophetic song. Albuquerque laid the plan, and Castro compleated the system of the Portuguese empire in the East. (For an account of which, see the preface.) It is with propriety Portuguese history.

¹ Fierce Hydal Kan.—The title of the Lords or Princes of Decan, who in their wars with the Portuguese have sometimes brought 400,000 men into the field. The

O'er Indus' banks, o'er Ganges' smiling vales
No more the hind his plunder'd field bewails:
O'er every field, O Peace, thy blossoms glow,
The golden blossoms of thy olive bough;
Firm based on wifest laws great Castro crowns,
And the wide East the Lusian Empire owns.

These warlike Chiefs, the sons of thy renown,
And thousands more, O Vasco, doom'd to crown
Thy glorious toils, shall through these seas unfold
Their victor-standards blazed with Indian gold;
And in the bosom of our flowery isle,
Embathed in joy shall o'er their labours smile.
Their nymphs like your's, their seast divine the same,
The raptured foretaste of immortal same.

So fung the Goddess, while the fister train
With joyful anthem close the facred strain;
Though Fortune from her whirling sphere bestow
Her gifts capricious in unconstant slow, priety therefore that the prophecy given to Gama is here fummed up. Nor is the difcretion of Camoens in this inflance inferior to his judgment. He is now within a few years of his own times, when he himfelf was upon the fcene in India. But whatever he had faid of his cotemporaries would have been liable to mifconfiruction, and every fentence would have been branded with the epithets of flattery or malice. A little Poet would have been happy in fuch an opportunity to refent his wrongs. But the filent contempt of Camoens does him true honour. In this historical fong, as already hinted, the Translator has been attentive, as much as he could, to throw it into these universal languages, the picturesque and characteristic. To convey the sublimest instruction to princes, is, according to Aristotle, the peculiar province of the Epic Muse. The striking points of view, in which the different characters of the Governors of India are here placed, are in the most happy conformity to this ingenious canon of the Stageryte.

Yet

Yet laurel'd honour and immortal fame Shall ever constant grace the Lusian name. So fung the joyful chorus, while around The filver roofs the lofty notes refound. The fong prophetic, and the facred feast, Now shed the glow of strength through every breast. When with the grace and majesty divine, Which round immortals when enamour'd shine, To crown the banquet of their deathless fame, To happy GAMA thus the fovereign Dame: O loved of heaven, what never man before, What wandering science never might explore, By heaven's high will, with mortal eyes to fee Great Nature's face unveil'd, is given to Thee. Thou and thy warriors follow where I lead: Firm be your steps, for arduous to the tread Through matted brakes of thorn and brier, bestrew'd With splinter'd flint, winds the steep slippery road. She spake, and smiling caught the hero's hand, And on the mountain's fummit foon they ftand; A beauteous lawn with pearl enamell'd o'er, Emerald and ruby, as the gods of yore Had sported here. Here in the fragrant air A wondrous globe appear'd, divinely fair! Through every part the light transparent flow'd, And in the centre as the furface glow'd.

The frame etherial various orbs compose,
In whirling 'circles now they fell, now rose;
Yet never rose nor fell, for still the same
Was every movement of the wondrous frame;
Each movement still beginning, still compleat,
It's Author's type, self-poised, perfection's seat.

Great Vasco thrill'd with reverential awe,
And rapt with keen desire, the wonder saw.
The Goddess markt the language of his eyes,
And here, she cried, thy largest wish suffice.
Great Nature's fabric thou dost here behold,
Th' etherial pure, and elemental mould
In pattern shewn complete, as Nature's God
Ordain'd the world's great frame, his dread abode;
For every part the power divine pervades,
The sun's bright radiance and the central shades;
Yet let not haughty reason's bounded line
Explore the boundless God, or where define,

In whirling circles now they fell, now rose,—Yet never rose nor fell——The motions of the heavenly bodies, in every system, bear, at all times, the same unisorm relation to each other; these expressions, therefore, are strictly just. The first relates to the appearance, the second to the reality. Thus while to us the sun appears to go down, to more western inhabitants of the globe he appears to rise, and while he rises to us, he is going down to the more eastern; the difference being entirely relative to the various parts of the earth. And in this the expressions of our Poet are equally applicable to the Ptolemase and Copernican systems. The ancient hypothesis which made our earth the centre of the Universe, is the system adopted by Camoens, a happiness, in the opinion of the Translator, to the English Lusiad. The new system is so well known, that a poetical description of it would have been no novelty to the English reader. The other has not only that advantage in its savour; but this description is perhaps the finest and sullest that ever was given of it in poetry, that of Lucretius, I. v. being chiefly argumentative, and therefore less picturesque.

Our Author studied at the university of Coimbra, where the ancient system and other doctrines of the Aristotelians then, and long afterward, prevailed.

Where in Himself in uncreated light, (While all his worlds around feem wrapt in night,) He holds his loftiest 'state. By primal laws Imposed on Nature's birth, Himself the cause, By her own ministry through every maze Nature in all her walks unfeen he fways. These spheres behold; the first in wide embrace. Surrounds the leffer orbs of various face; The Empyrean this, the holiest heaven, To the pure spirits of the Blest is given: No mortal eye its splendid rays may bear, No mortal bosom feel the raptures there. The earth in all her fummer pride array'd To this might feem a drear sepulchral shade. Unmoved it stands: within its shining frame, In motion swifter than the lightning's flame, Swifter than fight the moving parts may fpy, Another sphere whirls round its rapid sky. Hence Motion 1 darts its force, impulsive draws, And on the other orbs impresses laws; The Sun's bright car attentive to its force Gives night and day, and shapes his yearly course;

He holds his loftiest state.—Called by the old philosophers and school divines the Senstrium of the Deity.

Sensirium of the Deity.

* These spheres beheld.—According to the Peripatetics the universe consisted of Eleven Spheres inclosed within each other, as Fanshaw has familiarly expressed it by a simile which he has lent our Author. The sirst of these spheres, he says,

Of boxes) all the other orbs comprize

In their accounts of this first mentioned, but Eleventh Sphere, which they called the Empyrean or heaven of the Blest, the disciples of Aristotle, and the Arab Moors, gave a loose to all the warmth of imagination. And several of the Christian Fathers applied to it the descriptions of heaven which are found in the Holy Scripture.

1 Hence Metion darts its force. This is the Tenth Sphere, the Primum Mebile of the

Its force stupendous asks a pondrous sphere
To poise its sury and its weight to bear:
Slow moves that pondrous orb; the stiff, slow pace
One step scarce gains, while wide his annual race
Two hundred times the sun triumphant rides;
The Chrystal Heaven is this, whose rigour guides
And binds the starry fiphere: That sphere behold,
With diamonds spangled, and emblazed with gold;
What radiant orbs that azure sky adorn,
Fair o'er the night in rapid motion borne!
Swift as they trace the heaven's wide circling line,
Whirl'd on their proper axles bright they shine.

ancient system. To account for the appearances of the heavens, the Peripatetics ascribed double motion to it. While its influence drew the other orbs from east to west, they supposed it had a motion of its own from west to east. To effect this, the ponderous weight and interposition of the Ninth Sphere, or Chrystalline Heaven, was necessary. The strain flisted their places. This they called the motion of the Chrystalline Heaven, expressed by our Poet at the rate of one pace during two hundred solar years. The samous Arab astronomer Abulhasan, in his Meadows of Gold, calculates the revolution of this sphere to consist of 40,000 of our years. But modern discoveries have not only corrected the calculation, but have also ascertained the reason of the apparent motion of the fixt stars. The earth is not a perfect sphere; the quantity of matter is greater at the equator; hence the earth turns on her axis in a rocking motion, revolving round the axis of the ecliptic, which is called the procession of the equinoxes, and makes the stars seem to shift their places at about the rate of a degree in 72 years; aceording to which all the stars seem to perform one revolution in the space of 25,920 years, after which they return exactly to the same situation as at the beginning of this period. However impersest in their calculations, the Chaldaic astronomers perceived that the motions of the heavens composed one great revolution. This they called the Annus Magnus, which those who did not understand them mistook for a restoration of all things to their first originals, and that the world was at that period to begin anew in every respect. Hence the old Egyptian notion, that every one was at the end of thirty-nine thousand years to resume every circumstance of his present life, to be exactly the same in every contingency. And hence also the Legends of the Bramins and Mandarins, their periods of fifty thousand years, and the worlds which they tell us are already past and eternally to succeed each other.

Mand binds the starry sphere.—This was called the Firmament or Eighth Heaven. Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Apollo, Venus, Mercury, and Diana, were the planets which gave name to, and whose orbits composed the other spheres or heavens.

[•] However deficient the aftronomy of Abulhasan may be, it is nothing to the calculation of his Prophet Mohammed, who tells his disciples, that the stars were each about the biguess of an house, and hung from the sky on chains of gold.

Wide o'er this heaven a golden belt displays Twelve various forms; behold the glittering blaze! Through these the sun in annual journey towers, And o'er each clime their various tempers pours; In gold and filver of celeftial mine How rich far round the constellations shine! Lo, bright emerging o'er the polar tides In shining frost the northern 1 chariot rides; Mid treasured snows here gleams the grisly bear, And icy flakes incrust his shaggy hair. Here fair Andromeda of heaven beloved, Her vengeful fire, and by the gods reproved Beauteous Cassiope. Here sierce and red Portending storms Orion lifts his head; And here the dogs their raging fury shed. The fwan, fweet melodist, in death he sings, The milder fwan here fpreads his filver wings,

1 In shining frost the northern Chariot rides. - Commonly called Charleswain. page 195. Andromeda was the daughter of Cepheus, king of Ethiopia, and of Cassiope. Cassiope boasted that she and her daughter were more beautiful than Juno and the Nereids. Andromeda, to appease the goddes, was, at her father's command, chained to a rock to be devorted by a feet to be devoted Of Calisto, or the Bear, see the note on chained to a rock to be devoured by a seamonster, but was faved by Perseus, who obtained of Jupiter that all the family fhould be placed among the stars. Orion was a hunter, who, for an attempt on Diana, was stung to death by a serpent. The star of his name portends tempests. The Dogs; Fable gives this honour to those Erigone, however, that died mad with grief for the death of his mistress, has the best title to preside over the dog-days. The Swan; that whose form Jupiter borrowed to enjoy Leda. The Hare, when purfued by Orion, was faved by Mercury, and placed in heaven, to fignify that Mercury presides over melancholy dispositions. The Lyre, with which Orpheus charmed Pluto. The Dragon which guarded the golden apples of the Hesperides, and the ship Argo, compleat the number of the constellations mentioned by Cymons. If our Australia tioned by Camoens. If our Author has blended the appearances of heaven with those of the painted artificial sphere, it is in the manner of the classics. Ovid, in particular, thus describes the heavens, in the second book of his Metamorphoses.

Here

of different hunters. The faithful dog of

Here Orpheus' lyre, the melancholy hare, And here the watchful dragon's eye-balls glare; And Theseus' ship, Oh, less renown'd than thine, Shall ever o'er these skies illustrious shine. Beneath this radiant firmament behold The various Planets in their orbits roll'd: Here in cold twilight hoary Saturn rides, Here Jove shines mild, here fiery Mars presides, Apollo here enthroned in light appears The eye of heaven, emblazer of the spheres; Beneath him beauteous glows the Queen of Love, The proudest hearts her sacred influence prove; Here Hermes famed for eloquence divine, And here Diana's various faces shine; Lowest she rides, and through the shadowy night Pours on the glistening earth her silver light. These various orbs, behold, in various speed Pursue the journeys at their birth decreed. Now from the centre far impell'd they fly, Now nearer earth they fail a lower sky, A shorten'd course: Such are their laws imprest By God's dread Will, that Will m forever best.

m Such are their laws imprest by God's dread will—Though a modern narrative of bawdy-house adventures by no means requires the supposition of a particular Providence, that supposition, however, is absolutely necessary to the grandeur of an Epic Poem. The great examples of Homer and Virgil prove it; and Camoens understood and selt its force, While his sleet combat all the horrors of unplowed oceans, we do not view his heroes as idle wanderers; the care of heaven gives their voyage the greatest importance. When Gama falls on his knees and spreads his hands to heaven on the discovery of India, we are presented with a sigure infinitely more noble than that of the most successful Conqueror, who is supposed to act under the influence of fatalism.

The yellow earth, the centre of the whole,

There lordly rests sustain'd on either pole.

talism or chance. The human mind is con-fcious of its own weakness. It expects an elevation in poetry, and demands a degree of importance superior to the caprices of unmeaning accident. The poetical reader cannot admire the hero who is subject to fuch blind fortuity. He appears to us with an abject uninteresting littleness. Our poetical ideas of permanent greatness demand a Gama, a hero whose enterprises and whose person interest the care of heaven and the happiness of his people. Nor must this supposition be confined merely to the machinery. The reason why it pleases also requires that the supposition should be uniform throughout the whole poem. Virgil, by difmissing Eneas through the ivory gate of Elysium, has hinted that all his pictures of a future state were merely dreams, and has thus destroyed the highest merit of the compliment to his patron Augustus. But Camoens has certainly been more happy. A fair opportunity offered itself to indulge the opinions of Lucretius and the Academic Grove; but Camoens, in afcribing the government of the Universe to the Will of God, has not only preserved the philosophy of his poem perfectly uniform, but has also shewn that the Peripatetic system is, in this instance, exactly conformable to the Newtonian. But this leads us from one defence of our Author to another. We have feen that the supposition of a Providence is certainly allowable in a Poet: nor can we think it is highly to be blamed even in a philosopher. The Principia of Newton offer, what some perhaps may esteem, a demonstration of the truth of this opinion. Matter appeared to Sir Isaac as possessed of no property but one, the vis inertiæ, or dead inactivity. Motion, the centripetal and centrifugal force, appeared therefore to that great man, as added by the agency of something distinct from matter, by a Being of other properties. And from the infinite combinations of the universe united in one great defign, he inferred the omnipotence and omniscience of that primary Being

If we admit, and who can possibly deny it, that man has an idea of right and wrong, and a power of agency in both, he is then a moral, or in other words, a reasonable agent; a Being placed in circumstances, where his agency is infallibly attended with degrees of happiness or misery infinitely more real and durable than any animal fensation. Now to suppose that the Being who has provided for every want of animal nature, who has placed even the meanest infect in its proper line, and has rendered every purpose of its agency or existence complete, to suppose that he has placed the infinitely superior intellectual nature of man in an agency of infinitely greater confequence, but an agency of which he takes no superintendance—to suppose this, is only to suppose that the Author of Nature is a very imperfect Being. For no proposition can be more self-evident, than that an attention to the merest comparative trisles, attended with a neglect of infinitely greater concerns, implies an intellectual imperfection. Yet fome philosophers, who tell us there never was an Athiest, some who are not only in raptures with the great machinery of the universe, but are lost in admiration at the admirable adaption of an oyster-shell to the wants of the animal; some of these philosophers, with the utmost contempt of the contrary opinion, make no scruple to exclude the care of the Deity from any concern in the moral world. Dazzled, perhaps, by the mathematics, the case of many a feeble intellect; or bewildered and benighted in metaphysics, the case of many an ingenious philosopher; they erect a standard of truth in their own minds, and utterly forgetting that this standard must be founded on partial views, with the utmost assurance they reject whatever does not agree with the infallibility of their beloved test. There is another cast of philosophers no less ingenious, whose minds, absorbed in the in-numerable wonders of natural enquiry, can perceive nothing but a God of cockle-shells, and of grubs turned into butterflies. With all the arrogance of superior knowledge these virtuosi smile at the opinion which interests the Deity in the moral happiness or misery of man. Nay, they will gravely tell you, that such misery or happiness does not exist. At ease themselves in their elbow chairs, they cannot conceive there is such a thing in the world as oppressed innocence feeling

The limpid air enfolds in foft embrace
The ponderous orb, and brightens o'er her face.
Here foftly floating o'er th' aerial blue,
Fringed with the purple and the golden hue,
The fleecy clouds their swelling sides display;
From whence fermented by the sulphrous ray
The lightnings blaze, and heat spreads wide and rare;
And now in sierce embrace with frozen air,
Their wombs comprest soon feel parturient throws,
And white wing'd gales bear wide the teeming snows.

feeling its only confolation in an appeal to heaven, and its only hope, a trull in its care. Though the Author of Nature has placed man in a state of moral agency, and made his happiness and misery to depend upon it, and though every page of human history is stained with the tears of injured innocence and the triumphs of guilt, with miseries which must affect a moral or thinking being, yet we have been told, that God perceiveth it not, and that what mortals call moral evil vanishes from before his more persect fight. Thus the appeal of injured innocence, and the tear of bleeding virtue fall unregarded, unworthy of the at-tention of the Deity †. Yet with what rap-tures do these enlarged virtuosi behold the infinite wisdom and care of their Beelzebub, their god of flies, in the admirable and various provision he has made for the prefervation of the eggs of vermin, and the generation of maggots.

Much more might be faid in proof that our Poet's philosophy does not altogether deserve ridicule. And those who allow a general, but deny a particular Providence, will, it is hoped, excuse Camoens, on the confideration, that if we estimate a general moral providence by analogy of that pro-vidence which presides over vegetable and animal nature, a more particular one cannot possibly be wanted. If a particular providence, however, is still denied, another confideration obtrudes itself; if one pang of a moral agent is unregarded, one tear of injured innocence left to fall unpitied by the Deity, if Ludit in humanis Divina potentia rebui, the consequence is, that the human conception can form an idea of a much better God: And it may modestly be prefumed we may hazard the laugh of the wifest philosopher, and without scruple affert, that it is impossible that a created mind should conceive an idea of perfection, su-perior to that which is possessed by the Creator and Author of existence.

+ Perhaps, like Lucretius, some philosophers think this would be too much trouble to the Deity. But the idea of trouble to the Divine Nature, is much the same as another argument of the same philosopher, who having afferted, that before the creation the gods could not know what seed would produce, from thence wisely concludes, that the world was made by chance.

Ray, in his wisdom of God in the creation, (though he did not deny the moral providence) has carried this extravagance to the highest pitch. "To give life, saya he, is the intention of the creation; and how wonderful does the goodness of God appear in this, that the death and putteraction of one animal is the life of thousands." So the misery of a samily on the death of a parent is nothing, for ten thousand maggots are made happy by it.—Oh, Philosophy, when wilt thou sorget the dreams of thy surphers in Bedlam!

Thus cold and heat their warring empires hold,
Averse yet mingling, each by each controul'd,
The highest air and ocean's bed they pierce,
And earth's dark centre feels their struggles fierce.

The feat of Man, the Earth's fair breast, behold; Here wood-crown'd islands wave their locks of gold, Here spread wide continents their bosoms green, And hoary ocean heaves his breast between. Yet not th' inconstant ocean's furious tide May fix the dreadful bounds of human pride. What madning feas between these nations roar! Yet Lusus' race shall visit every shore. What thousand tribes whom various customs sway, And various rites, these countless shores display! Queen of the world supreme in shining arms, Her's every art, and her's all wisdom's charms, Each nation's tribute round her foot-stool spread, Here Christian Europe " lifts the regal head. Afric 'behold, alas, what alter'd view! Her lands uncultured, and her fons untrue; Ungraced with all that sweetens human life, Savage and fierce they roam in brutal strife; picturesque description of Africa is finely contrasted with the character of Europe. It contains also a masterly compliment to the expedition of Gama, which is all along represented as the harbinger and diffuser of the bleffings of civilization.

^{*} Here Christian Europe. — Ves Europa Christan. — As Europe is already described in the Third Lusiad, this short account of it has as great propriety, as the manner of it contains dignity.

o Afric behold .- This just and strongly

Eager they grasp the gifts which culture yields, Yet naked roam their own neglected fields. Lo, here enrich'd with hills of golden ore, Monomotapa's empire hems the shore, Where round the Cape, great Afric's dreadful bound Array'd in storms, by You first compass'd round; Unnumber'd tribes as bestial grazers stray, By laws unform'd, unform'd by reason's sway: Far inward stretch the mournful steril dales, Where on the parch'd hill side pale Famine wails. On gold in vain the naked favage treads; Low clay built huts, behold, and reedy sheds, Their dreary towns. Gonfalo's r zeal shall glow To these dark minds the path of light to shew: His toils to humanize the barbarous mind Shall with the martyr's palms his holy temples bind. Great Naya 4 too shall glorious here display His God's dread might: Behold, in black array, Numerous and thick as when in evil hour, The feathered race whole harvest fields devour, So thick, so numerous round Sofala's towers Her barbarous hords remotest Afric pours,

P Gonfalo's zeal shall glow. --- Gonfalo de Sylveyra, a Portuguese Jesuit, in 1555 failed from Lisbon on a mission to Monomotapa. His labours were at first successful; but ere he effected any regular establishment he was murdered by the Barbarians.

Gaftera abridged.

9 Great Naya 100.—" Don Pedro de Naya In 1505 he erocted a fort in 其下,让

the kingdom of Sofala, which is subject to Monomotapa. Six thousand Moors and Casres laid seige to this garrison, which he desended with only thirty-sive men. After having several times suffered by unexpected fallies, the Barbarians fled, exclaiming to their king that he had led them to hight against God." Caftera abridged. Say to Theth, a Spuil

In vain; Heaven's vengeance on their fouls imprest, They fly, wide scatter'd as the driving mist. Lo, Quama there, and there the fertile Nile, Curst with that gorging fiend the chrocodile, Wind their long way: The parent lake behold, Great Nilus' fount, unfeen, unknown of old, From whence diffusing plenty as he glides, Wide Abyssinia's realm the stream divides. In Abyssinia ' heaven's own alters blaze, And hallowed anthems chant Messiah's praise. In Nile's wide breast the isle of Meroe see! Near these rude shores an Hero sprung from thee, Thy fon, ' brave GAMA, shall his lineage shew In glorious triumphs o'er the Turkish foe. There by the rapid Ob, her friendly breast Melinda spreads, thy place of grateful rest.

The Abyfinia beaven's own altars blaze.

—Christianity was planted here in the first century, but mixed with many Jewish rites unused by other Christians of the East. This appears to give some countenance to the pretensions of their Emperors, who claim their descent from Solomon and the queen of Sheba, and at least reminds us of Acts 8. 27. where we are told, that the Treasurer of the queen of Ethiopia came to worship at Jerusalem. Innumerable monasteries, we are told, are in this country. But the clergy are very ignorant, and the laity gross barbarians. Much has been faid of the hill Amara,

Where Abyssin kings their issue guard—
by some supposed,
True Paradise, under the Ethiop line
By Nilus head, inclosed with shining rock,
A whole day's journey high.—MILTON.

and where, according to Urreta, a Spanish Jesuit, is the library founded by the queen of Sheba, and encreased with all those writings, of which we have either possession or only the names. The works of Noah, and the lectures on the mathematics which Abraham read in the plains of Mamre, are here. And so many are the volumes, that 200 monks are employed as librarians. It is needless to add, that Father Urreta is a second Sir John Mandevylle.

fecond Sir John Mandevylle.

Thy fon, brawe Gama. — When Don afford the Christian Emperor and Empress-mother of Ethiopia, solicited the assistance of the Portuguese against the usurpations of the Pagan king of Zeyla. Don Stephen sent his brother Don Christoval with 500 men. The prodigies of their valour assonished the Ethiopians. But after having twice defeated the Tyrant, and reduced his great army to the last extremity, Don Christoval, urged too far by the impetuosity of his youthful valour, was taken prisoner. He was brought before the Usurper, and put to M m m

Cape Aromata there the gulph defends, Where by the Red Sea wave great Afric ends. Illustrious Suez, seat of heroes old, Famed Hierapolis, high-tower'd, behold. Here Egypt's shelter'd fleets at anchor ride, And hence in squadrons sweep the eastern tide. And lo, the waves that aw'd by Moses' rod, While the dry bottom Ifrael's armies trod, On either hand roll'd back their frothy might, And stood like hoary rocks in cloudy height. Here Asia, rich in every precious mine, In realms immense, begins her western line. Sinai behold, whose trembling cliffs of yore In fire and darkness, deep pavilion'd, bore The Hebrews' God, while day with awful brow Gleam'd pale on Ifrael's wandering tents below. The pilgrim now the lonely hill ascends, And when the evening raven homeward bends, Before the Virgin-Martyr's ' tomb he pays His mournful vespers and his vows of praise.

death in the most cruel manner. Waxed threads were twisted with his beard and afterwards set on fire. He was then dipped in boiling wax, and at last beheaded by the hand of the Tyrant. The Portuguese esteem him a martyr, and say that his torments and death were inslicted because he would not renounce the Faith. See Faria y Sousa.

renounce the Faith. See Faria y Soufa.

Before the Virgin-Martyr's tomb.—He must be a dull Reader indeed who cannot perceive and relish the amazing variety which prevails in our poet. In every page it appears. In the historical narrative of wars, where it is most necessary, yet from the fameness of the subject, most difficult to attain, our author always attains it with the most graceful case. In the description of countries he not only follows the manner of Homer and Virgil, not only distinguishes each region by its most striking characteristic, but he also diversifies his geography with other incidents introduced by the mention of the place. St. Catherine, Virgin and Martyr, according to Romish histories, was buried on Sinai, and a chapel erected over her grave.

Gidda behold, and Aden's parch'd domain Girt by Arzira's rock, where never rain Yet fell from heaven; where never from the dale The chrystal rivulet murmured to the vale. The three Arabias here their breasts unfold, Here breathing incense, here a rocky wold; O'er Dofar's plain the richest incense breathes, That round the facred shrine its vapour wreathes; Here the proud war-steed glories in his force, As fleeter than the gale he holds the course. · Here, with his spouse and houshold lodged in wains, The Arab's camp shifts wandering o'er the plains, The merchant's dread, what time from eastern soil His burthen'd camels feek the land of Nile. Here Rosalgate and Farthac stretch their arms, And point to Ormuz, famed for war's alarms; Ormuz, decreed full oft to quake with dread Beneath the Lusian heroes' hostile tread, Shall fee the Turkish moons with flaughter gor'd Shrink from the lightning of De Branco's " fword There on the gulph that laves the Persian shore, Far through the furges bends Cape Afabore. There Barem's * ifle; her rocks with diamonds blaze, And emulate Aurora's glittering rays.

De Branco's favord.—Don Pedro de Castel-Branco. He obtained a great victory, near Ormuz, over the combined sleets of the Moors, Turks, and Persians.

^{*} Here Barem's isle——The island of Barem is situated in the Persian gulph, near the influx of the Euphrates and Tygris. It is celebrated for the plenty, variety and sineness of its diamonds.

From Barem's shore Euphrates' flood is seen, And Tygris' waters, through the waves of green lib and back In yellowy currents many a league extend, and a gailing add As with the darker waves averse they blend. Lo, Persia there her empire wide unfolds! In tented camp his state the monarch holds: Her warrior fons disdain the arms of fire, when the same A And with the pointed steel to fame aspire; warm animonal and T Their springy shoulders stretching to the blow, Their fweepy fabres hew the shrieking foe. There Gerum's isle the hoary ruin wears Where Time has trod: there shall the dreadful spears Of Soufa and Menezes strew the shore With Persian sabres, and embathe with gore. Carpella's cape, and fad Carmania's strand, and and organization There parch'd and bare their dreary wastes expand. A fairer landscape here delights the view; From these green hills beneath the clouds of blue. The Indus and the Ganges roll the wave, And many a fmiling field propitious lave.

tage afforded by invulnerable hides, and inchanted armour.

J Her warrior fons discain the arms of fire.—This was the character of the Perfians when Gama arrived in the East. Yet though they thought it dishonourable to use the musket, they esteemed it no disgrace to rush from a thicket on an unarmed soe. This reminds one of the spirit of the old romance. Orlando having taken the first invented cannon from the king of Friza, throws it into the sea with the most heroic execrations. Yet the heroes of chivalry think it no disgrace to take every advan

There Gerum's issee the boary ruin awears, Where Time has trod.—Presuming on the ruins which are found on this island, the natives pretend that the Armuzia of Pliny and Strabo was here situated. But this is a mistake, for that city stood on the continent. The Moors, however, have built a city in this isse, which they call by the ancient name.

Luxurious here Ulcinda's harvests smile, And here, disdainful of the seaman's toil, The whirling tides of Jaquet furious roar; Alike their rage when swelling to the shore, Or tumbling backward to the deep, they force The boiling fury of their gulphy course: A substantial of their gulphy course and the substantial of the substan Against their headlong rage nor oars nor sails, The stemming prow alone, hard toiled, prevails. Cambaya here begins her wide domain; A thousand cities here shall own the reign Of Lisboa's monarchs: He who first shall crown Thy b labours, GAMA, here shall boast his own. The lengthening fea that washes India's strand And laves the cape that points to Ceylon's land, (The Taprobanian isle, renown'd of yore) Shall fee his enfigns blaze from shore to shore. Behold how many a realm array'd in green The Ganges' shore and Indus' bank between! Here tribes unnumber'd and of various lore With woeful penance fiend-like shapes adore; Some Macon's corgies, all confess the sway Of rites that shun, like trembling ghosts, the day. Narsinga's fair domain behold; of yore Here shone the gilded towers of Meliapore.

He who first shall crown thy labours, Gama.—Pedro de Cabral, of whom see the presace.

of Mecca, the birth place of Mohammed.

Here India's angels weeping o'er d the tomb
Where Thomas sleeps, implore the day to come,

There are, to talk in the Indian flyle, a cast of gentleman, whose hearts are all impartiality and candour to every religion, except one, the most moral one which ever the world heard. A tale of a Bramin or a priest of Jupiter would to them appear worthy of poetry. But to introduce an Apostle—Common sense, however, will prevail; and the episode of St. Thomas will appear to the true Critic equal in dignity and propriety. In propriety, for To renew and compleat the labours of

To renew and compleat the labours of the Apostle, the messenger of heaven, is the great design of the hero of the poem, and of the suture missions in consequence of the discoveries which are the subject of it.

The Christians of St. Thomas, found in Malabar on the arrival of Gama, we have already mentioned, p. 49. but some farther account of the subject will certainly be agreeable to the curious. The Jesuit misfionaries have given most pompous accounts of the Christian antiquities of India and China. When the Portuguese arrived in India, the head of the Malabar Christians, named Jacob, stiled himself Metrapolitan of India and China. And a Chaldaic breviary of the Indian Christians offers praise to God for fending St. Thomas to India and China. In 1625, in digging for a foundation near Siganfu, metropolis of the province of Xenfi, was found a stone with a cross on it, full of Chinese, and some Syriac characters, containing the names of bishops, and an account of the Christian religion, " that it was brought from Judea; that having been weakened, it was renewed " under the reign of the great Tam," (cir. A. D. 630.) But the Christians, fay the Jesuits, siding with the Tartars, cir. A. D. 1200, were extirpated by the Chinese. In 1543, Fernand Pinto, observing some ruins near Peking, was told by the people, that 200 years before, a holy man, who worshiped Jesus Christ, born of a Virgin, lived there; and being murdered, was thrown into a river, but his body would not fink; and foon after the city was destroyed by earthquake. The same Jesuit found people at Caminam who knew the doctrines of Christianity, which they said was preached to their fathers by John the disciple of Thomas. In 1635, some heathens by night passing through a village in the province of Fokien saw some stones which emitted light, under which were found the figure of crosses. From China St. Thomas returned to Meliapore in Malabar, at a time when a prodigious beam of timber floated on the fea near the coast. The king endeavoured to bring it ashore, but all the force of men and elephants was in vain. St. Thomas defired leave to build a church with it, and immediately dragged it to shore with a fingle thread. A church was built, and the king baptized. This enraged the Bra-mins, the chief of whom killed his own fon, and accused Thomas of the murder. But the Saint, by restoring the youth to life, discovered the wickedness of his enemies. He was afterwards killed by a lance while kneeling at the altar; after, according to tradition, he had built 3300 stately churches, many of which were rebuilt, cir. 800, by an Armenian, named Thomas Cananeus. In 1523, the body of the Apostle, with the head of the lance beside him, was found in his church by D. Duarte de Meneses; and in 1558 was by D. Constantine de Braganza removed to Goa. To these accounts, selected from Faria y Seusa, let two from Osorius be added. When Martin Alonzo de Souza was viceroy, some brazen tables were brought to him, inscribed with unusual characters, which were explained by a learned Jew, and imported that St. Thomas had built a church in Meliapore. And by an account fent to Cardinal Henrico, by the Bp. of Cochin, in 1562, when the Portuguese repaired the ancient chapel of St. Thomas, † there was found a stone cross with feveral characters on it, which the best antiquarians could not interpret, till at last a Bramin

The existence of this breviary is a certain fact. These Christians had the Seripture also in the Chaldaic language.

language.

† This was a very ancient building, in the very first style of Christian churches. The Portuguese have now dissigned it with their repairs and new buildings.

The day foretold when India's utmost shore
Again shall hear Messiah's blissful lore.
By Indus' banks the holy Prophet trod,
And Ganges heard him preach the Saviour-God;
Where pale disease erewhile the cheek consumed,
Health at his word in ruddy fragrance bloom'd;
The grave's dark womb his awful voice obey'd,
And to the cheerful day restored the dead;
By heavenly power he rear'd the sacred shrine,
And gain'd the nations by his life divine.
The priests of Brahma's hidden rites beheld,
And envy's bitterest gall their bosoms swell'd.
A thousand deathful snares in vain they spread;
When now the Chief that wore the Triple 'Thread,

Bramin translated it, "That in the reign of Sagam, Thomas was fent by the Son of God, whose disciple he was, to teach the law of heaven in India; that he built a church, and was killed by a Bramin at the altar."

A view of Portuguese Asia, which must include the labours of the Jesuits, forms a necessary part in the comment on the Lusiad: This note, therefore, and some obvious restlections upon it, are in place. It is as easy to bury an inscription and find it again, as it is to invent a filly tale; but though sufficion of fraud on the one hand, and filly absurdity on the other, lead us to despise the authority of the Jesuits, yet one sact remains indisputable. Christianity had been much better known in the East, several centuries before, than it was at the arrival of Gama. Where the name was unknown, and where the Jesuits were unconcerned, crosses were found. The long existence of the Christians of St. Thomas in the midst of a vast Pagan empire, proves that the learned of that empire must have some knowledge of their doctrines. And these facts give countenance to some material conjectures concerning the religion of the Bramins. For these we shall give scope immediately.

When now the Chief who were the Triple Thread. Of this, thus Osorius; "Terna fila ab humero dextero in latus sinistrum gerunt, ut designent trinam in natura divina rationem." They (the Bramins) wear three threads, which reach from the right shoulder to the lest side, as significant of the trinal distinction in the Divine Nature." That some sects of the Bramins wear a symbolical Tessera of three threads, is acknowledged on all hands; but from whatever the custom arose, it is not to be supposed that the Bramins, who have thousands of ridiculous contradictory legends, should agree in their accounts or explanations of it. Faria fays, that according to the facred books of the Malabrians, the religion of the Bramins proceeded from fishermen, who left the charge of the temples to their successors, on condition they should wear some threads of their nets, in remembrance of Fired by the rage that gnaws the confcious breaft.

Of holy fraud, when worth shines forth confest, - 1 1 and a bloom T

their original. They have various accounts of a Divine Person having assumed human nature. And the God Brahma, as observed by Cudworth, is generally mentioned as united in the government of the universe with two others, fornetimes of different names. They have also images with three heads rifing out of one body, which they fay represent the Divine Nature*. But are there any traces of these opinions in the accounts which the Greek and Roman writers have given us of the Bramins? And will the wise pay any credit to the authority of those books which the public never faw, and which, by the obligation of their keepers, they are never to see? and some of which, by the confession of their keepers, since the appearance of Mohammed, have been rejected? The Platonic idea of a trinity of divine attributes was well known to the ancients, yet perhaps the Athanasian controverly offers a fairer field to the conjecturist. That controverly for several ages engrossed the conversation of the East. All the fubtilty of the Greeks was called forth, and no speculative contest was ever more univerfally or warmly disputed; so warmly, that it is a certain fact that Mohammed, by inserting into his Koran some declarations in favour of the Arians, gained innumerable profelytes to his new religion. Abyssinia, Egypt, Syria, Persia, and Armenia, were perplexed with this unhappy difpute, and from the earliest times these countries have had a commercial intercourse with India. The number, blasphemy, and absurdity of the Jewish legends of the Talmuds and Targums, bear a striking resemblance to the holy legends of the Bramins. The Jews also affert the great antiquity of their Talmudical legends. Adam, Enoch and Noah are named among their authors; but we know their date; Jerusalem, ere their birth, was destroyed by Titus. We also know that the accounts which the Greek writers give of the Bramins fall infinitely flort of those extravagancies which are confessed even by their modern admirers. And Mohammedism is not more different from Christianity, than the account which even these gentlemen give, is from that of Porphyry. That laborious philosopher, though possessed of all the knowledge of his age, though he mentions their metemplicolis and penances, has not a word of any of their idols, or the legends of Brahma or his brothers. On the contrary he represents their worship as extremely pure and fimple. Strabo's account of them is similar. And Eusebins has affured us they worshipped no images to Yet on the arrival of the modern Europeans in India, innumerable were their idols, and all the superstition of ancient Egypt in the adoration of animals and vegetables, seemed more than revived by the Bramins. Who that considers this striking alteration in their features, can withhold his contempt when he is told of the religious care with which these philosophers have these four thousand years preserved their facred rites: An abfurdity only equal to that of those who tell us that God instructed Adam in the mysteries of free masonry, and that Noah every new moon held a malon's lodge in the ark.

Ignorant or unmindful of what the Greeks and Romans have related of the Bramins, and unacquainted with the respectable authorities of many modern travellers, some gentlemen have lately assumed to themselves the only knowledge of the true doctrines of the East. Other Enquirers, and their means of intelligence, have been compared to an Indian receiving his knowledge of Christianity from a London carman. Yet alas, duped by the conversation of a learned Bramin, an adept in Jesuitism, who is sure to give an intelligent stranger the most glossing account, and not only thus

To these undoubted salts the author will not add the authority of a Xavier, who tells us, that he prevailed poor a Bramin to explain to him some part of their hidden religion; when to his surprize, the Indian, in a low voice, repeated the Ten Commandments.

Hell he invokes, nor hell in vain he sues;
His son's life-gore his wither'd hands imbrews;
Then bold assuming the vindictive ire,
And all the passions of the wosul sire,

ignorant and duped, but also strongly tinctured with the zeal of enthusiasm for their beloved researches, more than one of these gentlemen have contradicted each other, and have gravely pronounced, that every account of the Bramins, prior to his, was grossly erroneous, and that he himself has enjoyed the only means of knowledge, the friendship and instruction of an Indian philosopher—But let these gentlemen read, and be modest; let them learn to excuse those who cannot so warmly admire the wisdom of India; and let them consider how complete is the ridicule, when, on publishing their discoveries in England, they are obliged to confess that they entirely disagree with each other, though each confidently boatts the infallibility of his learned and honest Bramin - But the whole of the matter appears plainly to be this; The philosophy and mythology of the Bramins form such a boundless chaos of confusion and contradictions, that no two of these philosophers, unacquainted with each other, can possibly give the same or a confistent account of their tenets: And whenever one of superior ingenuity vamps up a fine philosophical theory out of the original mass, another, perhaps equally ingenious, puts one in mind of the spider in Swift's battle of the books, when the bee had de-stroyed her web. "A plague split you, (quoth the spider) for a giddy whoreson, is it you, with a vengeance, have made all this litter and do you think I have nothing else to do, in the devil's name, but to mend and repair after your a——?" In this strain, verily, may the Bramins of some modern discoverers exclaim to each other.

In the differtation on the religion of the Bramins, (Lusiad VII.) several specimens of their legends are already given. The Translator, however, is tempted to add another, from Faria's account of the sacred books of the Malabrians. They hold an eternal succession of worlds, each to take place after an Annus Magnus. Every thing at the end of these periods is destroyed, except Ixoreta or the Deity, which is then reduced to the fize of a dew drop; when, having chirped like a cricket, the divine fubstance in itself produces the five element, (for what they call the heavenly matter they esteem the fifth) and then dividing itself, the heavens and the earth are formed. In terra, simulac formata est, apparet mons argenteus, cujus in vertice conspiciuntur và àidoia, quæ verum Ixoreta sive Numen appellant, et causam causarum. Tum deus Ixora pene suo, infigni magnitudine, terrarum orbem in septem maria, septemque terras arando dividit. Liræ montes sunt, sulci vero valles ac flumina. Exoritur e tergo dei Ixora femina Chati, verbis quibusdam magicis evocata. Hi duo coire concupiunt, sed obstat longitudo membri dei Ixora; ille vero abscindit partes octodecim, ex quibus arma facta funt, nimirum hasta, arcus, ensis, &c. Deinde nimis arctam in femina Chati digito aperit viam, et sanguinem vulneris in palma receptum, in aerem dispergit, ex quo Sol, luna, stellæ, rosæ, herbæ odoriseræ, et angues, (quod genus animalium apud eos facrum ett) protinus formantur; et impedimento omni jam sublato, cocunt Ixora et Chati, procreantque ad terram incolendam homines, bruta, et dæmones malificos; in calo autem generant animarum 33,000,000. Besides this, almost infinite are the absurd legends of the god Ixora, and his brothers Vistnu and Brama. One other shall only be added. Vistnu, having metamorphosed himself into his younger brother Siri Christna, overcame the serpent Caliga, of nine leagues in length, which lived in a lake made by its own venom. This, and the origin of Chati, afford fome obvious hints to the investigators of mythology.

Weeping he bends before the Indian throne, Arraigns the holy man, and wails his fon: A band of hoary priests attest the deed, And India's king condemns the Seer to bleed. Inspired by heaven the holy victim stands, And o'er the murder'd corfe extends his hands, In God's dread power, thou slaughter'd youth, arise, And name thy murderer; aloud he cries. When, dread to view, the deep wounds instant close, And fresh in life the slaughter'd youth arose, And named his treachrous fire: The conscious air Quiver'd, and awful horror raised the hair On every head. From Thomas India's king The holy fprinkling of the living spring Receives, and wide o'er all his regal bounds The God of Thomas every tongue resounds. Long taught the holy Seer the words of life; The priests of Brahma still to deeds of strife, So boiled their ire, the blinded herd impell'd, And high to deathful rage their rancour swell'd. 'Twas on a day, when melting on his tongue Heaven's offer'd mercies glow'd, the impious throng Rifing in madning tempest round him shower'd The splinter'd flint; in vain the flint was pour'd: But heaven had now his finish'd labours seal'd; His angel guards withdraw th' etherial shield;

A Bramin's

A Bramin's javelin tears his holy breast— Ah heaven, what woes the widowed land exprest! Thee, Thomas, 'thee, the plaintive Ganges mourn'd, And Indus' banks the murmuring moan return'd; O'er every valley where thy footstep stray'd, The hollow winds the gliding fighs convey'd. What woes the mournful face of India wore, These woes in living pangs his people bore. His fons, to whose illumined minds he gave To view the ray that shines beyond the grave, His pastoral sons bedew'd his corse with tears, While high triumphant through the heavenly spheres, With fongs of joy the smiling angels wing His raptured spirit to th' eternal King. O you, the followers of the holy Seer, Foredoom'd the shrines of heavens own lore to rear, You fent by heaven his labours to renew, Like him, ye Lusians, simplest Truth pursue.

"Thee, Thomas, thee, the plaintive Ganges mourn'd.—The versification of the original is here exceedingly fine. Even those who are unacquainted with the Portuguese may perceive it.

Choraraóte Thomé, o Gange, o Indo, Choroute toda a terra, que pisaste; Mas mais te choráo as almas, que vestindo Se hiáo da Santa Fê, que lhe ensinaste: Mas os anjos do ceo cantando, & rindo, Te recebem na gloria

Like him, ye Lusians, simplest truth purfue.—It is now the time to sum up what has been said of the labours of the Jesuits.
Diametrically opposite to this advice was their conduct in every Asiatic country
N n R 2

where they pretended to propagate the gospel. Sometimes we find an individual sincere and pious, but the great principle which always actuated them as an united body was the lust of power and secular emolument, the possession of which they thought could not he better secured, than by rendering themselves of the utmost importance to the See of Rome. In consequence of these principles, where ever they came, their first care was to find what were the great objects of the sear and adoration of the people. If the Sun was esteemed the giver of life, Jesus Christ was the son of that luminary, and they were his younger brethren, sent to instruct the ignorant. If the barbarians were in dread of evil spirits

Vain is the impious toil with borrow'd grace, To deck one feature of her angel face;

Jesus Christ came on purpose to banish them from the world, had driven them from Europe", and the Jesuits were sent to the East to complete his unfinished mission. If the Indian converts still retained a veneration for the powder of burned cow-dung, the Jesuits made the fign of the cross over it, and the Indian besmeared himself with it as usual. Heaven, or universal matter, they told the Chinese, was the God of the Christians, and the sacrifices of Confucius were folemnized in the churches of the Jesuits. This worship of Confucius, Voltaire (Gen. Hist.) with his wonted accuracy denies. But he ought to have known, that this, with the worship of Tien or Heaven, had been long complained of at the court of Rome, (see Dupin) and that after the strictest scrutiny the charge was fully proved, and Clement XI. in 1703, sent Cardinal Tournon to the small remains of the Jesuits in the East with a papal decree to reform these abuses. But the Cardinal, soon after his arrival, was poisoned in Siam by the holy fathers. Xavier, and the other Jesuits who fucceeded him, by the dextrous use of the great maxims of their master Loyala, Omnibus omnia, et omnia munda mundis, gained ianumerable proselytes. They contradicted none of the favourite opinions of their converts, they only baptized, and gave them crucifixes to worship, and all was well. But their zeal in uniting to the See of Rome the Christians found in the East descended to the minutest particulars. And the native Christians of Malabar were fo violently persecuted as schismatics, that the heathen princes took arms in their defence in 1570, (see Geddes, Hist. of Malab.) and the Portuguese were almost driven from India. Abyssinia, by the same arts, was sleeped in blood, and two or three emperors lost their lives in endeavouring to establish the Pope's supremacy. An order at last was given from the throne, to hang every missionary without trial, wherever apprehended, the Emperor himself complaining that he could not enjoy a day in quiet for the intrigues of the Romish friars. In China also they soon rendered themselves insufferable. skill in mathematics and the dependent arts introduced them to great favour at court, but all their cunning could not conceal their villainy. Their unwillingness to ordain the natives raised suspicions against a profession thus monopolized by strangers; their earnest zeal in amassing riches, and their interference with, and deep defigns on fecular power, the fatal rock on which they have so often been shipwrecked, appeared, and their churches were levelled with the ground. About 90000 of the new converts, together with their teachers, were massacred, and their religion was prohibited. In Japan the rage of government even exceeded that of China, and in allusion to their chief object of adoration, the cross, several of the Jesuit fathers were crucified by the Japonese, and the revival of the Christian name was interdicted by the feverest laws. Thus, in a great measure, ended in the East the labours of the fociety of Ignatius Loyala, a fociety which might have diffused the greatest bleffings to mankind, could honesty have been added to their great learning and abilities. Had that zeal which laboured to promote the interests of their own brotherhood and the Roman See, had that indefatigable zeal been employed in the real interests of humanity and civilization, the great design of diffusing the law of heaven, challenged by its, author as the purpose of the Lusiad, would have been amply compleated, and the remotest hords of Tartary and Africa ere now had been happily civilized. But though the Jesuits have failed, they have afforded a noble lesson to mankind,

Though fortified with all the brazen mounds That art can rear, and watch'd by eagle eyes, Still will some rotten part betray the structure That is not based on simple honesty.

This trick, it is faid, has been played in America within these twenty years, where the notion of evil spirits gives the poor Indians their greatest misery. The French Jessits told the six nations, that Jesus Christ was a Frenchman, and had driven all evil damons from France; that he had a great love for the Indians, whom he intended also to deliver, but taking England in his way, he was crucified by the wicked Londoners.

Behind the veil's broad glare she glides away, And leaves a rotten form of lifeless painted clay.

Much have you view'd of future Lusian reign; Broad empires yet and kingdoms wide remain, Scenes of your future toils and glorious fway And lo, how wide expands the Gangic bay. Narsinga here in numerous legions bold, And here Oryxa boafts her cloth of gold. The Ganges here in many a stream divides, Diffusing plenty from his fattening tides, As through Bengala's ripening vales he glides; Nor may the fleetest hawk, untired, explore Where end the ricey groves that crown the shore. There view what woes demand your pious aid! On beds and litters o'er the margin laid The dying lift their hollow eyes, and crave Some pitying hand to hurl them in the wave. Thus heaven they deem, though vilest guilt they bore Unwept, unchanged, will view that guilt no more. There, eastward, Arracan her line extends; And Pegu's mighty empire fouthward bends:

tioned are literally true. And it is no uncommon scene for the English ships to be surrounded with the corpses which come floating down this hallowed stream.

The dying — The innumerable superstitions performed on the banks of this river, afford a pityable picture of the weakness of humanity. These circumstances here men-

Pegu, whose sons, so held old heaith, confest of ment of and A dog their sire; their deeds the tale attest. I show you more A pious queen their horrid hage restrain'd; the art the argument of their fury Nature's God arraign'd.

Ah, mark the thunders rolling o'er the sky!

Yes, bathed in gore shall rank pollution lie.

Where to the morn the towers of Tava shine,
Begins great Siam's empire's far stretch'd line.
On Queda's sields the genial rays inspire
The richest gust of spicery's fragrant sire.
Malacca's castled harbour here survey,
The wealthful seat foredoom'd of Lusian sway.

h Pegu, whose sons, so held old faith, confest, A dog their sire.—The tradition of this country boasted this infamous and impossible original. While other nations pretend to be descended of demi-gods, the Pegusians were contented to trace their pedigree from a Chinese woman and a dog, the only living creatures which survived a shipwreck on their coast. See Faria. This insamy, however, they could not deserve. Animals of a different species may generate together, but nature immediately displays her abhorience, in unvariably depriving the unnatural production of the power of procreation.

A pious queen their ho rid rage restrain'd.

Thus in the original:

Aqui soante arame no instrumento
Da géração costumão, o que usuao
Por manha da Raynha, que inventando
Tal uso, deitou sóra o error nefando.

Relatum est de Regina quadam terræ Peguensis, quod ad coercendum crimen turpissimuni subditorum suorum, legem tulit, ut universi mares orbiculum vel orbiculos quosdam æratos in penem illatos gererent. Ita sit: Cultro penis cuticulam dividunt, eamque in orbiculos hosce superinducunt: statim a prima septimana vulnus conglutinatur. Inseruntur plerumque tres orbiculi: magnitudine insimus ad modum juglandis, primus serme ad tenerioris gallinæ ovi modum extat. Trium liberorum parens ad libitum onus excutiat. Si horum aliquis a rege dono detur, ut gemma quantivis pretii æstimatur. To this let the testimony of G. Arthus, (Hist. Ind. Orient. p. 313.) be added, Virgines in hoc regno omnino nullas reperire licet: Puellæ enim omnes statim a pueritia sua medicamentum quoddam usurpant, quo muliebria distenduntur & aperta continentur: idque propter glohulos quos in virgis viri gestant; illis enim admittendis virgines arctiores nullo modo sussicerent.

According to Balby, and Caefar Frederic, the empire of Pegu, which the year before fent armies of two millions to the field, was in 1598, by famine and the arms of the neighbouring princes of Ava, Brama, and Siam, reduced to the most miserable state of desolation, the sew natives who survived having left their country an habitation for wild beafts.

Here to their port the Lufian fleets shall steer, From every shore far round assembling here The fragrant treasures of the eastern world: Here from the shore by rolling earthquakes hurl'd, Through waves all foam, Sumatra's isle was riven, And mid white whirlpools down the k ocean driven. To this fair isle, the golden Chersonese, Some deem the sapient Monarch plow'd the seas, Ophir 'its Tyrian name. In whirling roars How fierce the tide boils down these clasping shores! High from the strait the lengthening coast afar, Its moon-like curve points to the northern star, Opening its bosom to the filver ray When fair Aurora pours the infant day. Patane and Pam, and nameless nations more, Who rear their tents on Menam's winding shore, Their vassal tribute yield to Siam's throne; And thousands " more, of laws, of names unknown, That vast of land inhabit. Proud and bold, Proud of their numbers here the Laos hold

* And mid white whirlpools down the ocean driven. — See the fame account of Sicily. Virg. En. III.

Ophir its Tyrian name.—Sumatra has been by fome esteemed the Ophir of the Holy Scriptures; but the superior since for the gold of Sosala, and its situation, savour the claim of that Ethiopian isle. See Bochart. Geog. Sacr.

" And thousands more. — The extensive countries between India and China, where Ptolemy places his man-eaters, and where Mandevylle found men without heads, who faw and spoke through holes in their breasts, continues still very imperfectly known. The Jesuits have told many extravagant lies of the wealth of these provinces. By the most authentic accounts they seem to have been peopled by colonies from China. The religion and manufactures of the Siamese, in particular, confess the resemblance. In some districts, however, they have greatly degenerated from the civilization of the mother country.

The far spread lawns; the skirting hills obey
The barbarous Avas and the Bramas' sway.
Lo, distant far another mountain chain
Rears its rude cliffs, the Guios' dread domain;
Here brutalized the human form is seen,
The manners siend-like as the brutal mein:
With frothing jaws they suck the human blood
And gnaw the reeking ' limbs, their sweetest food;

1 And gnaw the reeking limbs. -- Much has been said on this subject, some denying and others afferting the existence of Anthropophagi or man-eaters. Porphyry, (de Abstin. l. 4. § 21. °) says that the Massagetæ and Derbices (people of northeastern Asia) esteeming those most miserable who died of fickness, when their parents and relations grew old, killed and eat them, holding it more honourable thus to consume them, than that they should be destroyed by vermin. Hieronymus has adopted this word for word, and has added to it an authority of his own, Quid loquar, says he, (Adv. Jov. l. 2. c. 6.) de cæteris nationibus; cum ipse adolescentulus in Gallia viderim Scotos, gentem Britannicam, hu-manis vesci carnibus, et cum per sylvas porcorum greges & armentorum, pecudumque reperiant, pastorum nates, et sæminarum papillas solere abscindere, & has solas ciborum delicias arbitrari? Mandevylle ought next to be cited. "Aftirwarde men gon be many yles be see unto a yle that men clepen Milhe: there is a full cursed peple: thei delyten in ne thing more than to fighten and to sle men, and to drynken gladlyest mannes blood, which they clepen Dieu." p. 235. Yet whatever absurdity may appear on the face of these tales; and what can be more absurd, than to suppose that a few wild Scots or Irish (for the name was then proper to Ireland) should so lord it in Gaul, as to eat the breafts of the women and the hips of the shepherds? Yet whatever absurdities our Mandevylles may have obtruded on the public, the evidence of the fact is not thereby wholly destroyed. Though Dampier and other vifiters of barbarous nations have assured us that they never met with any man-eaters, and though Voltaire has ridiculed the opinion, yet one may venture the affertion of their existence. without partaking of a credulity similar to that of those foreigners, who believed that the men of Kent were born with tails like sheep, (see Lambert's Peramb.) the punishment inflicted upon them for the murder of Thomas a Becket. Many are the credible accounts, that different barbarous nations used to eat their prisoners of war. According to the authentic testimony of the best Portuguese writers, the natives of Brazil, on their high festivals, brought forth their captives, and after many barbarous ceremonies, at last roasted and greedily de-voured their mangled limbs. During his torture, the unhappy victim prided himself in his manly courage, upbraiding their want of skill in the art of tormenting, and tell-ing his murderers that his belly had been the grave of many of their relations. Thus the fact was certain, long before a late voyage discovered the horrid practice in New Zealand [•] Ιτορθίλαι γθν Μασσαγίται κζ Δίρβικις άθλιμβάθες ἡγεῖσθαι τῶν οἰπιίων τὰς ἀυθομάτες τελευθήσανθας? ἔιὸ κζ φθάσανθις καθαθύεσεν κζ ἰτιῶνθαι τῶν φιλτάτων τὰς γιγητακοθας.

Horrid with figured seams of burning steel

Their wolf-like frowns their ruthless lust reveal.

Cambaya there the blue-tinged Mecon laves,

Mecon the eastern Nile, whose swelling waves,

Captain of rivers named, o'er many a clime

In annual period pour their fattening slime.

The simple natives of these lawns believe

That other worlds the souls of beasts meceive;

To drink human blood has been more common. The Gauls and other ancient nations practifed it. When Magalhaens proposed Christianity to the King of Subo, a north eastern Asiatic island, and when Francis de Castro discovered Santi-gana and other islands, an hundred leagues north of the Maluccos, the conversion of their kings was confirmed by each party drinking of the blood of the other. Our poet Spenfer tells us, in his View of the State of Ireland, that he has feen the Irish drink human blood, particularly he adds, "at the execution of a notable traitor at Lim-merick, called Murrogh O'Brien, I faw an old woman, who was his foster-mother, take up his head whilst he was quartering, and suck up all the blood that run thereout, faying, that the earth was not worthy to drink it, and therewith also steeped her face and breast and tore her hair, crying out and shrieking most terribly." It is worthy of regard that the custom of marking themselves with hot irons, and tattooing, is the characteristic both of the Guios of Camoens and of the present inhabitants of New Zcaland. And if, as its animals indicate, the island of Otaheite was first peopled by a shipwreck, the friendship existing in a small society might easily obliterate the memory of one custom, while the less unfriendly one of tattooing was handed down, a memorial that they owed their origin to pers the wish for it; and so little acquainted with the deductions of reasoning have some tribes been, that not only their animals, but even the ghosts of their domestic utenfils have been believed to accompany them in the islands of the Blessed. Long ere the voice of philosophy was heard, the opinion of an after state was popular in Greece. The works of Homer bear incontestible evidence of this. And there is not a feature in the history of the human mind better ascertained, than that no sooner did speculation seize upon the topic, than belief declined, and as the great Bacon observes, the most learned became the most atheistical ages. The reason of this is obvious. While the human mind is all simplicity, popular opinion is cordially received; but when reasoning begins, proof is expected, and deficiency of demonstration being perceived, doubt and disbelief naturally follow. Yet strange as it may appear, if the writer's memory does not greatly deceive him, these certain facts were denied by Hobbes. If he is not greatly mistaken, that gentleman, who gave a wretched, a most unpoetical translation of Homer, has fo grossly misunderstood his author, as to affert that his mention of a future state was not in conformity to the popular opinion of bis age, but only his own poetical fiction. He might as well have assured us, that the facrifices of Homer had never any existence in Greece. But as no absurdity is too gross for some geniuses, our murderer of Homer, our Hobbes, has likewise asserted, that the belief of the immortality of the human mind was the child of pride and speculation, unknown in Greace till long after the appearance of the lliad.

Where the fierce murderer wolf, to pains decreed, Sees the mild lamb enjoy the heavenly mead. Oh gentle Mecon, on thy friendly shore Long shall the Muse her sweetest offerings pour! When tyrant ire chaff'd by the blended lust Of Pride outrageous, and Revenge unjust, Shall on the guiltless Exile burst their rage, And madning tempests on their side engage, Preserved by heaven the song of Lusian same, The fong, O Vasco, facred to thy name, Wet from the whelming furge shall triumph o'er The fate of shipwreck on the Mecon's a shore, Here rest secure as on the Muse's breast! Happy the deathless song, the Bard, alas, unblest!

Chiampa there her fragrant coast extends. There Cochinchina's cultured land afcends: From Ainam bay begins the ancient reign Of China's beauteous art-adorn'd domain; Wide from the burning to the frozen skies O'erflow'd with wealth the potent empire lies. Here ere the cannon's rage in Europe or roar'd, The cannon's thunder on the foe was pour'd:

part of a Translator to add a warmth of part of a Franhator to add a warmin of colouring to a passage of this nature. For the literal translation of this place and farther particulars, see the Lise of Camoens.

Of the ere the cannon's rage in Europe roar'd—According to Le Conte's memoirs of China, and those of other travellars, the mariner's compasse for arms, and

Do gentle Mecon.——It was on the mouth of this river that Camoens suffered the unhappy shipwreck which rendered him the fport of fortune during the remainder of his life. Our Poet metions himself and the faving of his Lufiads with the greatest modesty. But though this indifference has its beauty in the original, it is certainly the lers, the mariner's compass, fire-arms, and

And here the trembling needle fought the north, Ere Time in Europe brought the wonder forth.

printing were known in that empire, long ere the invention of these arts in Europe. But the accounts of Du Halde, Le Compte, and the other Jesuits, are by no means to be depended on. It was their interest, in order to gain credit in Europe and at the court of Rome, to magnify the splendor of the empire where their mission lay, and they have magnified it into Romance itself. It is pretended that the Chinese used firearms in their wars with Zenghis Khan, and Tamerlane; but it is also said that the Sogdianians used cannon against Alexander. The mention of any sulphurous composition in an old writer is with some immediately converted into a regular tire of artillery. The Chinese, indeed, on the first arrival of Europeans, had a kind of mortars, which they called fire-pans, but they were utter firangers to the smaller fire-arms. Verbiest, a Jesuit, was the first who taught them to make brafs cannon fet upon wheels. And even fo late as the hostile menance which Anfon gave them, they knew not how to level or manage their ordnance to any advantage. Their printing is indeed much more ancient than that of Europe, but it does not deserve the same name, the blocks of wood with which they stamp their sheets being as inferior to the use of, as different from the moveable types of Europe. The Chinese have no idea of the graces of fine writing; here most probably the fault exists in their language; but the total want of nature in their painting and of fymetry in their architecture, in both of which they have fo long been experienced, afford a heavy accusation against their genius. But in planning gardens, and in the arts of beautifying the face of their country, they are unequalled. Yet even in their boatted gardening their genius tlands accused. The art of ingrafting, fo long known to Europe, is still unknown to them. And hence their fruits are vastly inferior in slavour to those of the western world. The amazing wall of desence against the Tartars, though 1500 miles in extent, is a labour inferior to the canals, lined on the fides with hewn stone, which every where enrich and adorn their country; some of which reach 1000 miles, and are of depth to carry vessels of burthen. These grand remains of antiquity prove there was a time when the Chincse were a much more accomplished people than at present. Though their princes for these many centuries have discovered no such efforts of genius as these, the industry of the people still remains, in which they rival and resemble the Dutch. In every other respect they are the most unamiable of mankind: Amazingly uninventive, for, though posfessed of them, the arts have made no progress among the Chinese these many centuries: Even what they were taught by the Jesuits is almost lost: So false in their dealings, they boast that none but a Chinese can cheat a Chinese: The crime which disgraces human nature, is in this nation of athiefts and the most stupid of all idolaters, common as that charter'd libertine, the Air. Destitute even in idea of that elevation of foul, which is expressed by the best sense of the word piety, in the time of calamity whole provinces are desolated by self-murder; an end, as Hume fays of some of the admired names of antiquity, not unworthy of so detestable a character: And, as it is always found congenial to baseness of heart, the most dastardly cowardice compleats the description of that of the Chinese.

Unimproved as their arts is their learning. Though their language confilts of few words, it is almost impossible for a stranger to attain the art of speaking it. And what an European learns ere he is feven years old, to read, is the labour of the life of a Chinese. In place of our 24 letters, they have more than 60,000 marks, which compose their writings; and their paucity of words, all of which may be attained in a few hours, requires such an infinite variety of tone and action, that the flightest mistake in modulation renders the speaker unintelligible. And in addressing a great man, in place of my Lord, you may call him a beaft, the word being the fame, all the difference confisting in the tune of it. A language like this must ever be a bar to the progress and accomplishments of literature. Of medicine they are very ignorant. The ginleng, which No more let Egypt boast her mountain pyres; To prouder same yon bounding wall aspires, they pretended was an universal remedy, is found to be a root of no fingular virtue. Their books confist of odes without poetry, and of moral maxims, excellent in themselves, but without investigation or reasoning. For to philosophical discussion and the metaphysics they feem utterly ilrangers, and when taught the mathematics by the Jesuits, their greatest men were lost in astonissment. Whatever their political wisdom has been, at present it is narrow and barbarous. Jealous least strangers steal their arts, arts which are excelled at Dresden and other parts of Europe, they preclude themselves from the great advantages which arise from an intercourse with civilized nations. Yet in the laws which they impose on every foreign ship which enters their ports for traffic, they even exceed the cunning and avarice of the Hollanders. In their internal policy the military government of Rome under the emperors is revived with accumulated barbarism. In every city and province the military are the constables and peace officers. What a picture is this! Nothing but Chinese or Dutch industry could preferve the traffic and population of a country under the controll of armed ruffians. But hence the emperor has leisure to cultivate his gardens, and to write def-picable odes to his concubines.

Whatever was their most ancient doctrine, certain it is that the legislators who formed the present system of China presented to their pecale no other object of worship than Tien Kamti, the material heavens and their influencing power; by which an intelligent principle is excluded. Yet finding that the human mind in the rudest breasts is conscious of its weakness, and prone to believe the occurrences of life under the power of lucky or unlucky observances, they permitted their people the use of sacrifices to these Lucretian Gods of superstitious sear. Nor was the principle of devotion imprinted by heaven in the human heart alone perverted; another unextinguishable passion was also missed. On tables, in every family, are written the names of the last three of their ancestors, added to each, Here rests his foul; and before these tables they burn incense and pay adoration. Confucius, who, according to their histories, had been in the West about 500 years before the Christian æra, appears to be only the confirmer of their old opinions; but the accounts of him and his doctrine are involved in uncertainty. In their places of worship however, boards are fet up, inscribed, This is the feat of the foul of Confucius, and to these and their ancestors they celebrate solemn facrifices, without feeming to possess any idea of the intellectual existence of the departed mind. The Jesuit Ricci, and his brethren of the Chinese mission, very bonestly told their converts, that Tien was the God of the Christians, and that the label of Confucius was the term by which they expressed his divine majesty. But after a long and severe scrutiny at the Court of Rome, Tien was found to fignify nothing more than beavenly or universal matter, and the Jesuits of China were ordered to renounce this. herefy. Among all the fects who worship different idols in China, there is only one who have any tolerable idea of the immortality of the foul; and among these, says. Leland, Christianity at present obtains some footing. But the most interesting particular of China yet remains to be mentioned. Conscious of the obvious tendency, Voltaire and others have triumphed in the great antiquity of the Chinese, and in the distant period they ascribe to the creation. But the bubble cannot bear the touch. If some Chinese accounts fix the æra of creation 40000 years ago, others are contented with no less than ago, others are contented with no leis t 884953. But who knows not that every nation has its Geoffry of Monmouth? And we have already observed the legends which took their rise from the Annus Magnus of the Chaldean and Egyptian astronomers, an apparent revolution of the stars, which in reality has no existence. To the fancyful, who held this Annus Magnus, it feemed hard to suppose that our world was in its first revolution of the great year, and to suppose that many were past was easy. And that this was the cafe we have absolute proof in the doctrines of the Bramins, (see the note on the VII. Lufiad) who, though they talk of hundreds of thousands of years which are past, yet confess, that this, the fourth world, has not yet attained its 6000th year. And much within this compass are all the credible proofs of Chinese antiquity comprehended. To three heads all these proofs are reduceable. Their form of government, which, till the conquest of the Tartars in 1644, bore the marks of the highest antiquity; their astronomical ob-servations, and their history.

A prouder boast of regal power displays Than all the world beheld in ancient days.

Simply and purely patriarchal every father was the magistrate in his own family, and the emperor, who acted by his substitutes the Mandarines, was venerated and obeyed as the father of all. The most passive submission to authority thus branched out was inculcated by Confucius and their other philosophers as the greatest duty of morality. But if there is an age in sacred or prophane history, where the manners of mankind are thus delineated, no superior antiquity is proved by the form of Chincse government. Their ignorance of the very ancient art of ingrafting fruit-trees, and the state of their language, so like the Hebrew in its paucity of words, a paucity characteristical of the ages when the ideas of men required few syllables to clothe them, prove nothing farther than the early separation of the Chinese colony * from the rest of mankind. Nothing farther, except that they have continued till very lately without any material intercouse with the other nations of the world.

A continued succession of astronomical observations, for 4000 years, was claimed by the Chinese, when they were first visited by the Europeans. Voltaire, that fon of truth, has often with great triumph mentioned the undubitable proofs of Chinese antiquity; but at these times he must have received his information from the same dream which told him that Camoens accompanied his friend Gama in the voyage which discovered the East Indies. If Voltaire and his disciples will talk of Chinese astronomy and the 4000 years antiquity of its persection, let them enjoy every consequence which may possibly result from it. But let them allow the same liberty to others. Let them allow others to draw their inferences from a few stubborn facts, facts which demonstrate the ignorance of the Chinese in astronomy. The earth, they imagined, was a great plain, of which their country was the midst; and so ignorant were they of the cause of eclipses, that they believed the sun and moon were af-faulted, and in danger of being devoured by a huge dragon. The stars were considered as the directors of human affairs, and thus their boatled astronomy ends in that filly imposition, judicial astrology. Though they had made some observations on the revolutions of the planets, and though in the emperor's palace there was an observatory, the first apparatus of proper instruments ever known in China was introduced by father Verhiest. After this it need scarcely be added, that their astronomical observations which

The Chinese Colony! Yes, let philosophy smile; let her talk of the different species of men which are found in every country, let her brand as absurd the opinion of Montesquieu, which derives all the human race from one family. Let her enjoy her triumph. Peace to her insolence, peace to her dreams and her reveries. But let common sense be contented with the demonstration (See Whiston, Bentley, &c.) that a Creation in every country is not wanted, and that one family is sufficient in every respect for the purpose. If philosophy will talk of black and white men as different in species, let common sense ask her for a demonstration, that chimate and manner of life cannot produce this difference, and let her add, that there monstration, that chimate and manner of life cannot produce this difference, and let her add, that there is the strongest presumptive experimental proof, that the difference thus happens. If philosophy draw her inferences from the different passions of different tribes; let common sense reply, that stript of every accident of brutalization and urbanity, the human mind in all its faculties, all its motives, hopes and feara, is most wonderfully the same in every age and country. If philosophy talk of the impossibility of peopling distant islands and continents from one family, let common sense tell her to read Bryant's Mythology. If philosophy affert that the Celts where ever they came found Aboriglaes, let common sense reply, there were tyrants enough almost 2000 years before their emigrations, to drive the wretched survivers of slaughtered hosts to the remotests wilds. She may also add, that many islands have been found which hore not one trace of mankind, and that even Otaheite bears the evident marks of recciving its inhabitants from a supplied of the survivers of survivers of the survivers of slaughtered hosts to the remotests wilds. She may also add, that many islands have been found which hore not one trace of mankind, and that even Otaheite bears the evident marks of recciving its inhabitants from a survivers of the survivers of the survivers of the survivers of the survivers of slaughtered hosts to the remotests will be survivers of slaughtered hosts to the remotests will be survivers of slaughtered hosts to the remotests will be survivers of slaughtered hosts to the remotests will be survivers of slaughtered hosts to the provide survivers of slaughtered hosts to the remotests will be survivers of slaughtered hosts to the remotests will be survivers of slaughtered hosts to the remotest survivers of slaughtered hosts to the remotest survivers of slaughtered hosts to the survivers of slaughtered hosts to the survivers of slaughtered hosts Not built, created feems the frowning mound;

O'er loftiest mountain tops and vales profound

Extends the wondrous length, with warlike castles crown'd.

Immense the northern wastes their horrors spread;

In frost and snow the seas and shores are clad.

These shores forsake, to suture ages due:

A world of islands claims thy happier view,

Where lavish Nature all her bounty pours,

And slowers and fruits of every fragrance showers.

Japan behold; beneath the globe's broad face

Northward she sinks, the nether seas embrace pretend an antiquity of 4000 years, are as false as a Welch genealogy, and that the Chinese themselves, when instructed by the Jesuits, were obliged to own that their calculations were erroneous and impossible. The great credit and admiration which their astronomical and mathematical knowledge procured to the Jesuits, afford an indubitable confirmation of these facts.

Ridiculous as their astronomical, are their. historical antiquities. After all Voltaire has faid of it, the oldest date to which their history pretends is not much above 4000 years. During this period 236 kings have reigned, of 22 different families. The first king reigned too years, then we have the names of fome others, but without any de-tail of actions, or that concatenation of events which distinguishes authentic history. That mark of truth does not begin to appear for upwards of 2000 years of the Chi-. nese legends. Little more than the names of kings, and these often interrupted with wide chasms, compose all the annals of China, till about the period of the Christian æra. Something like a history then commences, but that is again interrupted by a wide chafm, which the Chinese know not how to fill up otherwise, than by afferting that a century or two elapsed in the time, and that at fuch a period a new family mounted the throne. Such is the history of China, full brother in every family feature to those Monkish tales, which sent a daughter of Pharoah to be queen of Scotland, which sent Brutus to England, and a grandson of North to teach school among the mountains in Wales.

P Immense abe northern quastes their horrors fpread. — Tartary, Siberia, Samoyada, Kamchatki, &c. A short account of the Grand Lama of Thibet Tartary shall complete our view of the superstitions of the East. While the other Pagans of Asia worship the most ugly monstrous idols, the Tartars of Thibet adore a real living Cod. Tartars of Thibet adore a real living God. He fits cross-legged on his throne in the great Temple, adorned with gold and diamonds. He never speaks, but sometimes elevates his hand in token that he approves of the prayers of his worshippers. He is a ruddy well looking young man, about 25 or 27, and is the most miterable wretch on earth, being the mere puppet of his priests, who disparch him whenever age or fickness make any alteration in his features; and another, instructed to act his part, is put in his place. Princes of very distant provinces send tribute to this Deity and implore his bleffing, and as Voltaire has merrily told us, think themselves secure of benediction, if favoured with fomething from his Godship, esteemed more facred than the hallowed cow-dung of the Bramins.

Her eastern bounds; what glorious fruitage there, Illustrious GAMA, shall thy labours bear! How bright a silver mine! when heaven's own lore From Pagan dross shall purify her ore.

Beneath the purple wings of spreading morn,
Behold what isles these glistening seas adorn!
Mid hundreds yet unnamed, Ternate behold!
By day her hills in pitchy clouds inroll'd,
By night like rolling waves the sheets of sire
Blaze o'er the seas, and high to heaven aspire.
For Lusian hands here blooms the fragrant clove,
But Lusian blood shall sprinkle every grove.
The golden birds that ever sail the skies
Here to the sun display their shining dyes,
Each want supplied on air they ever soar;
The ground they touch not till they breathe no' more.
Here Banda's isles their fair embroidery spread
Of various fruitage, azure, white, and red;

9 How bright a filver mine.—By this beautiful metaphor, omitted by Castera, Camoens alludes to the great success, which in his time attended the Jesuit missionaries in Japan. James I. sent an embassy to the sovereign, and opened a trade with this country, but it was soon suffered to decline. The Dutch are the only Europeans who now trassific with the Japonese, which it is said they obtain by trampling on the cross and by abjuring the Christian name. In religion the Japonese are much the same as their neighbours of China. And in the frequency of felf-murder, fays Voltaire, they vie with their brother islanders of England.

The ground they touch not.—These are commonly called the birds of Paradise. It was the old erroncous opinion that they always soared in the air, and that the female hatched her young on the back of the male. Their feathers bear a mixture of the most beautiful azure, purple and golden colours, which have a fine effect in the rays of the sun.

And birds of every beauteous plume display Their glittering radiance, as from spray to spray, From bower to bower on bufy wings they rove, To feize the tribute of the spicy grove. Borneo here expands her ample breast, By Nature's hand in woods of camphire dreft; The precious liquid weeping from the trees Glows warm with health, the balfom of difease. Fair are Timora's dales with groves array'd, Each rivulet murmurs in the fragrant shade, And in its chrystal breast displays the bowers Of Sanders, bleft with health-restoring powers. Where to the fouth the world's broad furface bends. Lo. Sunda's realm her spreading arms extends. From hence the pilgrim brings the wondrous tale, A river groaning through a dreary dale, For all is stone around, converts to stone Whate'er of verdure in its breast is thrown. Lo, gleaming blue o'er fair Sumatra's skies Another mountain's trembling flames arise; Here from the trees the gum all fragrance swells, And foftest 'oil a wondrous fountain wells.

channel, harden into stone and incrust the original retainers.

From hence the pilgrim brings the wonzous tale——Streams of this kind are common in many countries. Castera attributes this quality to the excessive cold of the waters, but this is a mistake. The waters of some springs are impregnated with sparry particles, which adhering to the herbage or the slay on the banks of their [&]quot;Here from the trees the gum—Benjamin, a fpecies of frankincense. The oil mentioned in the next line, is that called the rock oil, a black sociid mineral oleum, good for bruises and sprains.

Nor these alone the happy isle bestows, Fine is her gold, her filk resplendent glows. Wide forests there beneath Maldivia's "tide From withering air their wondrous fruitage hide. The green-hair'd Nereids tend the bowery dells, Whose wondrous fruitage poison's rage expells. In Ceylon, lo, how high yon mountain's brows! The failing clouds its middle height enclose. Holy the hill is deem'd, the hallowed " tread Of fainted footstep marks its rocky head. Laved by the Red-fea gulph Socotra's bowers There boast the tardy aloe's beauteous flowers. On Afric's strand foredoom'd to Lusian sway Behold these isles, and rocks of dusky gray; From cells unknown here bounteous ocean pours The fragrant amber on the fandy shores. And lo, the Island of the * Moon displays Her vernal lawns, and numerous peaceful bays;

Wide forests there beneath Maldivia's tide.—A sea plant, resembling the palm, grows in great abundance in the bays about the Maldivian islands. The boughs rise to the top of the water, and bear a kind of apple, called the coco of Maldivia, which is esteemed an antidote against poison.

The imprint of a human foot is found on the high mountain, called the Pic of Adam. Legendary tradition fays, that Adam, after he was expelled from Paradife, did penance 300 years on this hill, on which he left the print of his footstep.

This tale feems to be Jewish or Mohammedan, for the natives, according to Capt. Knox, who was twenty years a captive in Ceylon, pretend the impression was made by the God Buddow, when he ascended to heaven, after having for the falvation of mankind, appeared on the earth. His priests beg charity for the fake of Buddow, whose worship they perform among groves of the Bogahah-tree, under which, when on earth, they say he usually sat and taught.

 And lo, the Island of the Moon.

Madagafcar is thus named by the natives.

The halcyons hovering o'er the bays are seen, And lowing herds adorn the vales of green.

Thus from the cape where fail was ne'er unfurl'd Till thine auspicious sought the Eastern World,
To utmost wave where first the morning star
Sheds the pale lustre of her silver car,
Thine eyes have view'd the empires and the isses,
The world immense that crowns thy glorious toils.
That world where every boon is shower'd from heaven,
Now to the West, by Thee, Great Chief, is 'given.

And still, oh Blest, thy peerless honours grow,
New opening views the smiling Fates bestow.
With alter'd face the moving globe behold;
There ruddy evening sheds her beams of gold.
While now on Afric's bosom faintly die
The last pale glimpses of the twilight sky,
Bright o'er the wide Atlantic rides the morn,
And dawning rays another world adorn:
To farthest north that world enormous bends,
And cold beneath the southern pole-star ends.
Near either 2 pole the barbarous hunter drest.
In skins of bears explores the frozen waste:

Homer has concluded the Iliad.

2 Near either pole—We are now prefented with a beautiful view of the American world! Columbus discovered the West Indies before, but not the Continent till 1498, the year after Gama sailed from Lisbon.

Where

[&]quot;Now to the West, by Thee, Great Chief, it given—The sublimity of this eulogy on the expedition of the Lusiad has been already observed: What follows is a natural completion of the whole; and, the digressive exclamation at the end excepted, is exactly similar to the manner in which

Where smiles the genial sun with kinder rays, Proud cities tower, and gold-roofed temples blaze. This golden empire, by the heaven's decree, Is due, Casteel, O favour'd Power, to Thee! Even now Columbus o'er the hoary tide Purfues the evening fun, his navy's guide. Yet shall the kindred Lusian share the reign, What time this world shall own the yoke of Spain. The first bold 'hero who to India's shores Through vanquish'd waves thy open'd path explores, Driven by the winds of heaven from Afric's strand Shall fix the Holy Cross on you fair land. That mighty realm for purple wood renown'd, Shall stretch the Lusian empire's western bound. Fired by thy fame, and with his king in ire, To match thy deeds shall Magalhaens baspire.

a The first bold hero—Cabral, the first after Gama who sailed to India, was driven by Tempest to the Brazils, a proof that more ancient voyagers might have met with the same fate. He named the country Santa Cruz, or Holy Cross; it was afterward named Brazil, from the colour of the wood, with which it abounds. It is one of the sinest countries in the new world, and still remains subject to the crown of Portugal.

b To match thy deeds shall Magalhaens afpire — Camoens, though he boats of the actions of Magalhaens as an honour to Portugal, yet condemns his defection to the king of Spain, and calls him

O Magalbaens, no feito com verdade Portuguez, porèm nao na lealdade.

"In deeds truly a Portuguese, but not in Ioyalty." And others have bestowed upon him the name of Traytor, but perhaps un-Ppp 2 deservedly. Justice to the name of this great man requires an examination of the charge. Ere he entered into the service of the king of Spain by a solemn act he unnaturalized himself. Oforius is very severe against this unavailing rite, and argues that no injury which a prince may possibly give, can authorize a subject to act the part of a traytor against his native country. This is certainly true, but it is not strictly applicable to the case of Magalhaens. Many eminent services performed in Africa and India entitled him to a certain allowance, which, though inconsiderable in itself, was esteemed as the reward of distinguished merit, and therefore highly valued. For this Magalhaens petitioned in vain. He sound, says Faria, that the malicious accusations of some men had more weight with his sovereign than all his services. After this unworthy repulse, what patronage at the court of Lisbon could he hope? And though no injury can vindicate the man who draws his sword against his native country, yet no moral duty requires that he who has fome important discovery in meditation should slifle his design, if uncountenanced by his native prince. It has been alledged, that he embroiled his country in disputes with Spain. But neither is this strictly applicable to the neglected Magalhaens. The courts of Spain and Portugal had solemnly settled the limits within which they were to make discoveries and settlements, and within these did Magalhaens and the court of Spain propose that his discoveries should terminate. And allowing that his calcula-tions might mislead him beyond the bounds prescribed to the Spaniards, still his apology is clear, for it would have been injurious to each court, had he supposed that the faith of the boundary treaty would be trampled upon by either power. If it is faid that he aggrandifed the enemies of his country, the Spaniards, and introduced them to a dangerous rivalship with the Portuguese settlements; let the sentence of Faria on this subject be remembered, " let princes beware, fays he, how by neglect or injustice they force into desperate actions the men who have merited rewards." As to rivalship, the case of Mr. Law, a North Briton, is apposite. This gentleman wrote an excellent treatise on the improvement of the trade and fisheries of his native country, but his proposals were totally neglected by the commissioners, whose office and duty it was to have patronised him. Was Law, therefore, to fit down in obscurity on a barren field, to stiffe his genius, lest a foreign power, who might one day be at war with Great Britain, should be aggrandised by his efforts in commercial policy? No, surely. Deprived of the power of raifing himself at home, Mr. Law went to France, where he became the founder of the Missippi and other important schemes of commerce; yet Law was never branded with the name of traytor. The reason is obvious. The government of Great Britain was careless of what they lost in Mr. Law, but the Portuguese perceived their loss in Magalhaens, and their anger was vented in reproaches.

In all, but loyalty, of Lusian soul, No fear, no danger shall his toils controul.

In the end of the 15th and beginning of the 16th centuries, the spirit of discovery broke forth in its greatest vigour. The east and the west had been visited by Gama and Columbus; and the bold idea of failing to the east by the west was revived by Magalhaens. Revived, for misled by Strabo and Pliny, who place India near to the west of Spain, Columbus expecting to find the India of the ancients when he landed on Hifpaniola, thought he had discovered the Ophir of Solomon. And hence the name of Indies was given to that and the neighbouring islands. Though America and the Moluccas were now found to be at a great distance, the genius of Magalhaens still suggested the possibility of a western pasfage. And accordingly, possessed of his great design, and neglected with contempt at home, he offered his service to the court of Spain, and was accepted. With five ships and 250 men he sailed from Spain in September 1519, and after many difficulties, occasioned by mutiny and the extreme cold, he entered the great Pacific Ocean or South Seas by those straits which bear his Spanish name Magellan. From these straits, in the 52½ degree of southern latitude, he traversed that great ocean, till in the toth degree of North latitude he landed on the island of Subo or Marten. The king of this country was then at war with a neighbouring prince, and Magalhaens, on condition of his conversion to christianity, became his auxiliary. In two battles the Spaniards were victorious, but in the third. Magalhaens, together with one Martinho, a judicial astrologer, whom he usually confulted, was unfortunately killed. Chagrin-ed with the disappointment of promised victory, the new baptized king of Subo made peace with his enemies, and having invited to an entertainment the Spaniards on shore, he treacherously poisoned them all. The wretched remains of the fleet arrived at the Portuguese settlements in the isles of Banda and Ternate, where they were received, fays Faria, as friends, and

Along these regions from the burning zone To deepest south he dares the course unknown. While to the kingdoms of the rifing day, To rival Thee he holds the western way, A land of 'giants shall his eyes behold, Of camel strength, surpassing human mould: And onward still, thy fame his proud heart's guide Haunting him unappeased, the dreary tide Beneath the fouthern star's cold gleam he braves, And stems the whirls of land-surrounded waves. Forever facred to the hero's fame These foaming straits shall bear his deathless name. Through these dread jaws of rock he presses on, Another ocean's breast, immense, unknown, Beneath the fouth's cold wings, unmeasured, wide, Receives his vessels; through the dreary tide not as intruding strangers; a proof that the boundary treaty was esteemed sufficiently sacred. Several of the adventurers were sent to India, and from thence to Spain, in Portuguese ships, one ship only being in a condition to return to Europe by the Cape of Good Hope. This vessel, named the Victoria, however, had the honour to be the first which ever surrounded the globe; an honour by some ignorantly attributed to the ship of Sir Francis Drake. Thus unhappily ended, says Oforius, the expedition of Magalhaens. But the good Bishop was mistaken, for a few years after he wrote, and somewhat upwards of sifty after the return of the Victoria, Philip II. of Spain availed himself of the discoveries of Magalhaens. And the navigation of the South Seas between Spanish America and the Asian Archipelago, at this day forms the basis of the power of Spain. A basis, however, which is at the mercy of Great Britain, while her ministers are wife enough to preferve her great naval superiority. A Gibraltar in the South Seas is only wanting. But when this is mentioned, who can withhold his eyes from the isthmus of Darien? the rendezvous appointed by nature for the sleets which may one day give law to the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans: A settlement which to-day might have owned subjection to Great Britain, if justice and honour had always presided in the cabinet of William the Third.

CA land of giants—The Patagonians. Various are the fables of navigators concerning these people. The Spaniards who went with Magalhaens affirmed they were about ten seet in height, since which voyage they have risen and fallen in their stature, according to the different humours of our fea wits.

In darkling shades, where never man before Heard the waves howl, he dares the nameless shore.

Thus far, O favoured Lusians, bounteous heaven Your nation's glories to your view has given.

What ensigns, blazing to the morn, pursue
The path of heroes, open'd first by You!

Still be it your's the first in fame to shine:
Thus shall your brides new chaplets still entwine,
With laurels ever new your brows enfold,
And braid your wavy locks with radiant gold.

How calm the waves, how mild the balmy gale!
The halcyons call, ye Lusians, spread the sail!
Old ocean now appealed shall rage no more,
Haste, point the bowsprit to your native shore:
Soon shall the transports of the natal soil
O'erwhelm in bounding joy the thoughts of every toil.

The Goddess d spake; and VASCO waved his hand, And soon the joyful heroes crowd the strand.

d The Goddess spake——We are now come to the conclusion of the sistent of the island of Venus, a siction which is divided into three principal parts. In each of these the poetical merit is obvious, nor need we sear to affert that the happiness of our author, in uniting all these parts together in one great episode, would have excited the admiration of Longinus. The heroes of the Lusiad receive their reward in the island of Love. They are led to the palace of Thetis, where, during a divine feaft, they hear the glorious victories and conquests of the heroes who are to succeed them in their Indian expedition, sung by a Syren; and the face of the globe itself, described by the Goddels, discovers the universe, and particularly the extent of the Eastern World, now given to Europe by the success of Gama. Neither in grandeur nor in happiness of completion completion may the Eneid or Odyssey be mentioned in comparison. The Iliad alone, in Epic conduct (as already observed) bears a strong resemblance. But however great in other views of poetical merit, the games at the funeral of Patroclus and the redemption of the body of Hector, confidered as the interesting conclusion of a great whole, can never in propriety and grandeur be brought into competition with the admirable episode which concludes the Poem on the Discovery of India.

The lofty ships with deepen'd burthens prove The various bounties of the Isle of Love.

Soon after the appearance of the Lufiad, the language of Spain was also enriched with an heroic poem. The author of which has often imitated the Portuguese poet, particularly in the fiction of the globe of the world, which is shewed to Gama. In the Araucana, a globe furrounded with a radiant fphere, is also miraculously supported in the air; and on this an enchanter shews to the Spaniards the extent of their dominions in the new world. But Don Alonzo d'Arcilla is in this, as in every other part of his poem, greatly inferior to the poetical spirit of Camoens. Milton, whose poetical conduct in concluding the action of his Paradise Lost, as already pointed out, seems formed upon the Lufiad, appears to have had this passage particularly in his eye. For though the machinery of a visionary fphere was rather improper for the situation of his personages, he has nevertheless, though at the expence of an impossible supposition, given Adam a view of the terrestial globe. Michael sets the father of mankind on a mountain.

The hemisphere of earth in clearest ken Stretch'd out to th' amplest reach of prospect

His eye might there command wherever flood City of old or modern fame, the feat Of mightiest empire, from the destined walls Of Cambalu ———, &c. On Europe thence and where Rome was to fway And even the mention of America-feems copied by Milton,

- in spirit perhaps he also saw Rich Mexico, the feat of Montezume, And Cusco in Peru, the richer seat

Of Atabalipa, and yet unspoiled Guiana, whose great city Geryon's sons Call El Dorado -

It must also be owned by the warmest admirer of the Paradise Lost, that the description of America in Camoens, Vedes a grande terra, que contina Val de Califfo ao seu contrario polo.

To farthest north that world enormous bends, And cold beneath the foutliern pole-star ends-

Conveys a bolder and a grander idea than all the names enumerated by Milton.

Some short account of the Writers, whose authorities have been adduced in the course of these notes, may not now be improper. Fernando Lopez de Castagneda went to India on purpose to do honour to his countrymen, by enabling himfelf to record their actions and conquests in the East. As he was one of the first writers on that subject, his geography is often im-perfect. This defect is remedied in the writings of John de Barros, who was particularly attentive to this head. But the two most eminent, as well as fullest, writers on the transactions of the Portuguese in the East, are Manuel de Faria y Sousa, knight of the order of Christ, and Hieronimus Osorius, bishop of Sylves. Faria, who wrote in Spanish, was a laborious enquirer, and is very full and circumstantial. With honest indignation he reprehends the rapine of commanders and the errors and unworthy refentments of kings. But he is often so dryly particular, that he may rather be called a journalist than an historian. And by this uninteresting minuteness, his style for the greatest part is rendered inelegant. The Bishop of Sylves, however, claims a different character. His latin is elegant, and his manly and fentimental manner entitles him to the name of Historian, even where a Livy, or a Tacitus, are mentioned. But a sentence from himself, unexpected in a l'athèr of the communion of Rome, will characterife the liberality of his mind. Talking of the edict of king Emmanuel, which compelled the Jews to embrace Christianity, under

Nor leave the youths their lovely brides behind, In wedded bands, while time glides on, conjoin'd; Fair as immortal fame in smiles array'd, In bridal fmiles, attends each lovely maid. O'er India's Sea, wing'd on by balmy gales That whisper'd peace, soft swell'd the steady sails: Smooth as on wing unmoved the eagle flies, When to his eyrie cliff he sails the skies, Swift o'er the gentle billows of the tide, So smooth, so soft, the prows of GAMA glide; And now their native fields, for ever dear, In all their wild transporting charms appear; And Tago's bosom, while his banks repeat The founding peals of joy, receives the fleet. With orient titles and immortal fame The hero band adorn their Monarch's name; Sceptres and crowns beneath his feet they lay, And the wide East is doom'd to Lusian ' sway.

fevere persecution; Nec ex lege, nec ex religione factum..... tibi assumas, fays he, ut libertatem voluntatis impedias, et vincula mentibus effrenatis injicias? At id neque fieri potest, neque Christi sanctissimum numen approbat. Voluntarium enim sacrificium non vi malo coactum ab hominibus expetit: Neque vim mentibus inferri, fed voluntates ad studium veræ religionis allici & invitari jubet.

It is faid, in the preface to Oforius, that his writings were highly esteemed by Queen Mary of England, wife of Philip II. What a pity is it, that this manly indignation of the good Bishop against the impiety of religious persecution, made no impression on the mind of that bigotted Princess!

"And the voide East is doom'd to Lusian fway—Thus in all the force of ancient simplicity, and the true sublime ends the Poem of Camoens. What follows, is one of those exuberances we have already endeavoured to defend in our Author, nor in the strictest sense is this concluding one without propriety. A part of the proposition of the Poem is artfully addressed to King Sebastian, and he is now called upon in an address, which is an artful second part to the former, to behold and preserve the glories of his throne.

Enough, my Muse, thy wearied wing no more Must to the seat of Jove triumphant soar. Chill'd by my nation's cold neglect, thy fires Glow bold no more, and all thy rage expires. Yet thou, Sebastian, thou, my king, attend: Behold what glories on thy throne descend! Shall haughty Gaul or sterner Albion boast That all the Lusian fame in Thee is lost! Oh, be it thine these glories to renew, And John's bold path and Pedro's course pursue: Snatch from the tyrant Noble's hand the fword, And be the rights of human-kind restored. The statesman prelate, to his vows confine, Alone auspicious at the holy shrine; The priest, in whose meek heart heaven pours its fires. Alone to heaven, not earth's vain pomp, aspires. Nor let the Muse, great King, on Tago's shore, In dying notes the barbarous age deplore. The king or hero to the Muse unjust Sinks as the nameless slave, extinct in dust. But fuch the deeds thy radiant morn portends, Aw'd by thy frown ev'n now old Atlas bends His hoary head, and Ampeluza's fields Expect thy founding steeds and rattling shields.

c And John's bold path and Pedro's course pursue. — John I. and Pedro the Just, two of the greatest of the Portuguese monarchs.

And shall these deeds unsung, unknown, expire! Oh, would thy smiles relume my fainting ire! I, then inspired, the wondering world should see Great Ammon's warlike son revived in Thee; Revived, 'unenvious of the Muse's slame That o'er the world resounds Pelides' name.

f Reviv'd, unenvious—Thus imitated, or rather translated into Italian by Guarini.

Con si sublime stil' forse cantato
Havrei del mio Signor l'armi e l'honori,
Ch' or non havria de la Meonia tromba
Da invidiar Achille——

Similarity of condition, we have already observed, produced similarity of complaint and sentiment in Spenser and Camoens. Each was unworthily neglected by the Gothic grandees of his age, yet both their names will live, when the remembrance of the courtiers who spurned them shall fink beneath their mountain tombs. Three beautiful stanzas from Phinehas Fletcher on the memory of Spenser, may also serve as an epitaph for Camoens. The unworthy neglect, which was the lot of the Portuguese Bard, but too well appropriates to him the elegy of Spenser. And every Reader of taste, who has perused the Lusiad, will think of the Cardinal Henrico, and feel the indignation of these manly lines.

Witnesse our Colin", whom the all the Graces And all the Muses nurst; whose well taught song Parnussus self and Glorian ; embraces, And all the learn'd and all the shepherds throng; Yet all his hopes were crost, all fuits deni'd; Discourag'd, scorn'd, his writings viliss'd:

Poorly (poor man) he liv'd; poorly (poor man) he di'd.

And had not that great hart (whose honour'd | head Ah lies full low) piti'd thy wosul plight,
There hadst thou lien unwept, unburied,
Unblest, nor grac'd with any common rite:
Yet shalt thou live, when thy great foe † shall sink Beneath his mountain tombe, whose same shall stink;
And time his blacker name shall blurre with blackest ink.

O let th' lambic Muse revenge that wrong Which cannot slumber in thy sheets of lead; Let thy abused honour crie as long As there be quills to write, or eyes to reade: On his rank name let thine own votes be turn'd, Oh may that man that hath the Muses form'd, Alive, nor dead, be ever of a Muse adorn'd.

* Colin Clout, Spenser.

d Glorian, Elizabeth in the Faeric Queen.

1 The Earl of Essex.

THE END.

